

The Spirit of France

A Study Introductory to the Description and History of the Country and of the French People

By J. E. C. Bodley

Corresponding Member of the French Institute

AUGUST 2, 1914, is a date which will never be effaced from the memory of those who lived that day in France when the general mobilization was announced. From Brittany to Navarre, from Flanders to Provence, every town and village was the scene of an inspiring spectacle. The unexpected call to arms was hailed with one unanimous cry of cheerful acceptance of war with that enemy which just forty-four years before had invaded the French frontier and was marching to final and un-avenged victory at the gates of Paris.

All this had happened before the birth of the ardent youths who were chanting the "Marseillaise" on every point of the territory. But they were encouraged by many of their elders who had seen the other war, and the shouting crowds on their way to join the colours thought that this was surely the first stage of their journey to Berlin. When it was known that England was hastening to the rescue, no doubt remained that the French, with their British Allies, would march through the Unter den Linden in less time from the opening of hostilities than that taken by the Germans to reach the Champs Elysées after the Franco-Prussian War.

Visions of an Army Triumphant

Had that dream been realized; had the French with their Allies crossed the Eastern frontier, pushing back the German hordes and devastating the Fatherland, as fitting punishment for their unprovoked aggression; had a speedy peace been dictated to fallen Germany from its captive capital, a new spirit might have arisen in the French nation comparable to that which sent the patriotic levies to the victories of Valmy and Jemmapes, singing the song of Rouget de Lisle, to avenge the invasion of 1792—a spirit which, in its development, changed the history of Europe.

No one can ever know what form that spirit would have taken after a swift victory in 1914 and a triumphal march to Berlin. If the fortune of war had taken this turn, an ambitious soldier, who had led the armies of France across the plains of Rhenish Prussia and Westphalia, leaving at Cologne and Mayence lasting souvenirs similar to those left by the Germans at Reims and Soissons, and treating Essen as they treated Lille, such a victorious leader might have been acclaimed by the conquering troops and by the people of Paris, awaiting his return, as the saviour of his country, "capax imperii."

Incomplete Fruits of Victory

Short of that, even though no modification of government had resulted from a speedy victory, it might have re-endowed the national temperament with that genial urbanity, of which France used proudly to boast as its heritage from old Latin civilization. An able French writer, M. Marcel Boulenger, asks the question: "Sommes nous encore polis?" and answers it with an emphatic negative. He suggests that the French have not recovered their traditional politeness, which was impaired by the humiliation of the Franco-Prussian War, because the traces of 1870-71 were not wiped out by the German surrender of 1918.

Though Alsace and Lorraine were restored to France, so many limitations have been imposed on the legitimate fruits of victory that it is no wonder if a spirit of discontent should continue in a nation aggrieved that, after all its sacrifices, real victory was still unachieved. There are aged men in France to-day who, though they were no lovers of the Second Empire, recall with pride the triumphal march through Paris in 1859 of the troops of Magenta and Solferino, who brought back with them the spoils of Nice and Savoy, putting the nation into good temper with a government become unpopular; and they contrast the happy result of the Austrian campaign in which France had no warrant to participate, and that of the Great War which was forced upon France.

THE SPIRIT OF FRANCE

Victory Without Exultation

Thus the victory over Germany was not of a kind to produce any spirit of exhilaration in the nation. It was France and not Germany that had to endure the sorrow and ruin of invasion. For four years and a quarter, while the German soil was more immune from damage than sea-protected England, the richest provinces of France, up to the gates of Paris, were laid waste and drenched with the blood of the young generation of Frenchmen and of their British Allies. When the armistice came it was officially announced that the Germans were beaten. But in France there were few signs of victory.

There was unspeakable relief at the ending of those years of carnage, when day by day in thousands of towns and villages the women watched the mayor come forth from the Mairie, whither came the news from the front, and waited to see at which doors he would knock, the messenger of death.

War Ravages Redressed by Industry

There was thankfulness that fate had not given to Germany the power to dictate the terms of peace. But soon it was felt that Germany, the wanton provoker of the war, was let off with a penalty lenient compared with that which, in case of its victory, it would have imposed on France, and which certainly would have included the dismemberment of France and its total impoverishment by fine and confiscation. The old sores of 1870-71, handed down to succeeding generations, not having been healed by the German defeat, no new spirit of cheerfulness in the nation can be recorded. At the same time the people in the provinces have set to work with dogged serenity to redress the ravages of the war and the disadvantages of the peace, with their indomitable industry, which is not a new element in the spirit of France.

That love and aptitude for hard work, together with the memory of the horrors suffered by the victors in the war, are barriers proof against the infiltration of the spirit of militarism in the French nation, contrary to the imputations of some English critics, who ought to know better. It is not difficult to show that militarism, unless a new meaning is attached to that term, has no effective existence in France. Before the war, notwithstanding the unrequited offence of Germany, French policy was culpably pacifist.

A Sacrifice to Pacifism

In 1905 the dismissal of that excellent Minister for Foreign Affairs, M. Delcassé, to please the Kaiser was a fatal act of subserviency to Germany. M. Delcassé had been at the Quai d'Orsay for the long term of seven years under four prime ministers. The last of them, M. Rouvier, enjoyed the confidence of the cosmopolitan financiers, who, then as now, were tenderly solicitous for the prosperity of Germany. He had told the German Ambassador in Paris how he admired the Kaiser, and that France did not want revenge, but peace at any price. Thereupon the Kaiser's government demanded the dismissal of M. Delcassé on the ground that he was negotiating an alliance with England, and threatened that if such alliance were concluded Germany would attack France.

There was then at the British Foreign Office a rare British product, a minister who knew and understood the French. Lord Lansdowne had, in 1904, negotiated the entente with France which had smoothed away many causes of friction between the two countries. He now formally proposed that it should be transformed into an alliance, and M. Delcassé, on the day that he announced to the cabinet the British offer, was dismissed from office—for fear of war with Germany.

THE SPIRIT OF FRANCE

Political France was so pacifist that the portentous event of the refusal of the alliance—which, if concluded, might have made the Great War impossible—roused little interest in political circles. Parliament was busy with the rupture of the Concordat, discussing such questions as to whether the curé or the mayor should have the right to order the ringing of the bells in the disestablished Church.

Consciousness of the ultra-pacific policy of the Republic sharpened the exasperation of the French when Germany retorted by wantonly attacking them, and justified those who had never ceased to cherish the hope of revenge. It revived that warlike spirit which sent the youth of France enthusiastic to join the colours at the country's call.

But the long-drawn struggle on the ravaged soil of France, with none of the romance of war to inspire their imagination or to palliate their misery, sickened them of war and all its incidents—a sickener shared by the soldiers of their British allies.

Modern Warfare and Militarism

The nameless horror of modern warfare has sunk deep into the soul of France in a campaign compared with which the retreat from Moscow was a military promenade. Even in the Franco-Prussian War there were episodes which cast a glory over defeat, such as the forlorn charge of the cuirassiers at Reichshofen. But in the Great War victory itself was destitute of glamour. Yet cold courage of a finer temper was required from French and British soldiers than that kindled by the cavalry charge or the assault of a city.

The result of such experience of war is that there is no militarism in France of the kind which gave Napoleon the support of the nation in his career of conquest and autocracy. Still less is there any of the sentiment which acclaimed General Boulanger, though innocent of victory, "en revenant de la revue," when his black horse captivated a Paris weary of inglorious President Grévy and his attendant politicians. France still enjoys its parliamentary politicians, and none of them is suspected of taking riding lessons, as was the Abbé Siéyès in 1799, when he saw that the counter-revolution was certain, and would need a leader on horseback—his equestrian ambitions being foiled by the return of General Bonaparte from Egypt.

Civilian Ministers of War

Nothing can be so far-fetched as the idea that the actual rulers of the Republic are preparing the way for militarism. All the prime ministers since the war have been old office-holders—"ministrables"—of anti-militarist type; and the resumption of the practice of having a civilian politician for War Minister bars the way for an ambitious soldier, who might take advantage of his position of official ascendancy at the head of the army. M. Clemenceau, the organizer of victory, had he been younger, and able to counter the intrigues of the jealous, might have had the power to make his government an instrument of militarism; but this was not a likely proceeding for the old enemy of Boulanger.

Militarism Impossible in France

It cannot be too strongly repeated that militarism is incompatible with parliamentary government, and its establishment in France would put into the ranks of the unemployed all the politicians who have held office for the last thirty years, except those who would submit to serve under a military dictatorship. So the new regime, in the improbable case of its being supported by a plebiscite, would be opposed by an irrepressible phalanx of adroit and eloquent politicians. For militarism signifies a government dominated by the army, such as that of Germany under the Kaiser or of France under Napoleon III.—a regime impossible to set up in

THE SPIRIT OF FRANCE

France without a revolution upsetting the parliamentary Republic. As the Great War did not produce the "Général X" of Renan's dreams there is no more prospect of a militarist government in France than there is of a restoration of the monarchy.

Armaments a Form of Insurance

France justly repudiates the charge of militarism. It insists that its policy of maintaining a large army is based on fear of Germany. France is indeed the nation which has the greatest desire and need for disarmament and peace. Those who accuse the French of keeping up a big army for reasons of military vainglory know nothing of the spirit of France or of the condition of the country. With its feeble birth-rate, and its need of a numerous population to restore the ravages of the enemy, it cannot afford to bestow its remaining manhood and its diminished resources on an army kept up to revive any distant tradition. There is no place for militarism in France, and if it makes the sacrifice of maintaining the strongest standing army in Europe it is because of the unconsumed menace of Germany, which forces upon France a policy not of militarism, but of insurance.

The French Point of View

That policy of insurance is closely connected with a by-product of the war which has had an unfortunate influence on the spirit of France. Years have passed since the official ending of the war; by 1922 hostility to England had become an untoward element in the spirit of France—the French Government and the British having joined issue on the capital problems of victory submitted to the Allies. We have nothing to do here with the texts of treaties or the proceedings of conferences. Our task is to note the effect on the spirit of France of their consequences.

The unhappy disaccord of the two Governments first arose from the ignorance of the French point of view with which the British proposals were tactlessly presented to Britain's ally. At this the French Press and politicians showed a precipitate readiness to be irritated. That disposition might have been placated had any British spokesman possessed a knowledge of the French temperament and had known how to use it with conciliatory wisdom. An elementary course of French history would have taught that through the ages that susceptibility was always on the alert in France when Anglo-French relations were in debate. When the war ceased and the two nations thought that their combined sacrifice had for ever laid low the menace of Germany, it seemed as though their immemorial variance had come to a noble end—a fair prospect soon marred by ignorant perversity.

The British Peace Delegations

From the first the British delegations in France gave a bad impression to the French—even to grateful admirers of England. The staunchest of these, M. Clemenceau, in a scathing epigram too forcible to quote, summed up the social, ethical, and mental quality of some of them. Their attitude was not that of the representatives of a mourning and impoverished nation visiting an ally likewise stricken. Their big retinue resembled a crowd of pleasure seekers lodged in luxurious hotels at the expense of the crippled taxpayer, who never knew what he had to pay for their diversions or how the greatness of England was asserted by undignified festival in Paris, and later at other attractive resorts in Europe.

In this connexion an ingenuous English writer observed that the sister democracy of France would rejoice to see, as a new bond of harmony between the two peoples, that England had followed its example in admitting to high office poor men of obscure origin, and in sending them to take part in international councils. When the Republic was young the legend of proletarian virtue was such that candidates for parliament would boast themselves " fils de paysans ," when really they were of middle-class origin. That

LIBERTY, EQUALITY, AND FRATERNITY UNDER A PEACEFUL REPUBLIC

Set in the centre of the Place de la République, this splendid achievement of the sculptor's art worthily symbolises the spirit of modern France. A colossal bronze figure representing the French Republic, with an olive branch held aloft, occupies the summit. On the pedestal are seated bronze figures of Liberty, Equality, and Fraternity, and the front is guarded by a lion with the urn of Universal Suffrage illusion soon passed, and later, when the Republic was endangered by the Panamá and other scandals, Frenchmen would congratulate Englishmen that their government remained in the hands of men of substance and tradition, under no temptation to be venal. For until this century the French, even when least friendly to England, envied and respected the English political system.

Photo, Donald McLeish

THE SPIRIT OF FRANCE

British Political Morality

Those who know not the modern secrets of Downing Street hope that the integrity of Mr. Gladstone and of Lord Salisbury still imposes its example. But there are Englishmen familiar with the coulisses of politics who doubt it, and their opinions are read beyond the English Channel. One of them, knighted for his services to the Allies as a war-correspondent and well known in France, wrote that the Coalition Government was "the most sinister combination of corrupt materials ever known in English history." When this, and many a similar criticism from other English pens, was translated in the French journals their commentary was obvious. Englishmen of authority, they said, would not make such aspersions unless they were true.

The British official thesis, that German prosperity is essential to the well-being of Europe, is only an economic conjecture; while it is certain that the restoration of Germany, prospering in the non-payment of its war debts, will primarily benefit the cosmopolitan financiers.

The Joan of Arc Tradition

A curious feature of French discontent with England is the tendency of the national spirit to resort to historical reasons to explain the mutual discord. It is an ancient tradition. Samuel Wilberforce, who had a knowledge of France unusual in an English ecclesiastic, went to Paris when the international situation had points of resemblance with that of to-day. England and France had won the Crimean war. Their victorious alliance, then as now, was sealed by the sacrifice of French and British soldiers who fought side by side, and the two governments were officially friendly, though to quote a pamphlet authorised later by the Emperor, "The alliance between France and England, which had seemed indissoluble, was threatened by disagreements arising from the interpretation of the conditions of peace." The bishop spent an evening at the Tuileries with the Emperor, he dined with Thiers, and had long talks with Guizot, Cousin, Mérimée, and Mignet—there were great names in France in those days, as in England. He thus heard the views of government and opposition, which were finally summed up by another well-informed Frenchman, who told him that "the old French hatred for England was unabated, dating from Joan of Arc."

It was the practice to evoke the Maid of Lorraine whenever Anglo-French relations were strained. But during the Great War, and for some time after, she was more aptly acclaimed as the symbol of repulsed invasion. It was the achievement of the British delegates to revive the legend of a Joan of Arc who personified enmity to England, and to bring out all the old histories of anti-English grievance from the Heights of Abraham to the Rock of St. Helena. Sometimes Lafayette was put on the scene, to be withdrawn when America, too friendly to Great Britain, seemed oblivious of Yorktown.

Street Nomenclature

A proof of the general interest taken by the French in international affairs is their impulsive practice of giving to well-known streets the names of foreign potentates whose nationality for the moment is popular in France. Anglo-Parisians, most loyal to the British Crown, regret to find the sixty-years-old Avenue de l'Alma re-baptized Avenue Georges V. We may hope that that august name may inspire respect in France sixty years hence. But there are new names given to thoroughfares after the war which already have lost their prestige in French hearts. President Wilson, from being a hero, was held up to reprobation, but not before his name had been adopted for a street sign in scores of French towns, as well as in Paris.

THE SPIRIT OF FRANCE

The periodic friendliness of the French for English-speaking America shows that difference of language is not of much account as a cause of Anglo-phobia. One incident, in this connexion, which did not improve Anglo-French relations, was due to American influence as much as to British—the virtual substitution of English for French as the language of diplomacy. The spirit of the French, proud of the primacy of their language in international councils, was sorely and justifiably tried by it. In England, not one person in ten thousand knew of this change in diplomatic usage. From Brest to Marseilles it was commented upon as another slight to France inflicted by England.

Influence of the Press

In a land which, in 1914, saw its third invasion in a hundred years, every class of the people has reason to be interested in international questions. On both sides of the Channel a number of newspapers have used their power to excite animosity between the two Allies. In this the French journals have done more widespread harm than the English, not because they are more violent, but because the popular element in the British nation buys journals primarily for news relating to sport—unconnected with the game and gamble of politics; while in France the part of the paper most interesting (after the feuilleton) to the people is that which deals with French exterior relations.

The concierge, who has no counterpart in England, is an expert in foreign affairs; the commercial traveller is a disseminator of political gossip; for the petty functionary, diplomacy has no secrets; and they all read, with contagious indignation, of the artifices of England as revealed in their papers, few of which ever intimate that the people of England, except as taxpayers, have little share in the mutual official antagonism of the two allied countries. The worst provocation offered by the British Government does not excuse the ribald licence of the Parisian "comic" Press, with its ignoble anti-English caricatures. They foment a feeling of popular malevolence which has sometimes taken the form of insults offered to British subjects by minor officials, or even of outrage to the British uniform, stained on battlefields, the memory of which ought to be sacred to every Frenchman. Such painful incidents, deplored by all that is best in France, are not only signs of ill-feeling.

British Prestige in France

They also show that, at a time when, apart from its politicians and profiteers, the British nation was never worthier of respect, owing to its sacrifices in the war, the name of British citizen has no longer the protective prestige it enjoyed in the "Civis Romanus" days of Palmerston—when he said that "A British subject, in whatever land, shall feel confident that the strong arm of England will protect him against any wrong."

While amateur British plenipotentiaries have irritated the French, they have not inculcated respect for England, and by reducing diplomatists to the status of clerks in attendance on politicians they have impaired the authority of Britannic diplomacy.

The Link of Blood

It is to be hoped that the spirit of France may be recalled from the path of hostility to England, towards which it has been driven by the influences we have noted. English lovers of France are consoled in their anxiety by constant proof of the abiding friendship for England of the soundest elements in the French nation. At the darkest moment of official disaccord an Englishman might visit French country homes without any sign to remind him that there was dissension between England and France, provided he avoided the newspapers of both countries. In peaceful homes, away from the zone of German devastation, there is nothing to

PARIS VIEWED FROM QUASIMODO'S LOFTY EYRIE

Wondrous changes have been wrought in Paris since the famous gargoyles were first set upon the towers of Notre Dame. To-day this bird-like creature's eyes command the sacristy that occupies the site of the old Archbishop's House, scan the Ponts de l'Archevêché and De la Tournelle, and, round the bend, the splendid Pont d'Austerlitz, and watch the smoke rising from many factory chimneys

Photo, Donald McLeish

LOOKING WESTWARD OVER THE CITY OF LIGHT

Superb views are obtained from the roof of Notre Dame owing to its central position in the Île de la Cité in the Seine. At the foot of the south-western tower the Pont au Double crosses the river, and, beyond, one sees the Petit Pont, the dome of the Hôtel des Invalides, the tapering Eiffel Tower, and in the haze, the twin turrets of the Trocadéro recall the war except the empty places of sons of the house who never came back from it.

Photo, Donald McLeish

THE SPIRIT OF FRANCE

Such pathetic reminders of the German crime nurture a feeling of tender sympathy between hosts and guests. For the bereaved French know that side by side with the graves of their sons are those of countless English boys who died fighting for France. Here we find a noble expression of the spirit of France engendered by the war, and it is a pity that such a sentiment should be disturbed by the wrangles of politicians.

French and British Comrades in Arms

If the English traveller goes forth into the fields and talks with busy peasants who, toiling for the recovery of French prosperity more effectively than the politicians, have no time to read newspapers, he will hear from those who went through the war nothing but goodwill and admiration for "les rudes soldats" sent by England to share their hardships and beat down their enemies.

Legend of the Esprit Nouveau

So far we have dealt with the spirit of France as it has been affected or generated by the Great War, not, however, without mentioning other aspects of it. In 1914, France—as well as other countries—was undergoing an evolution so forcible that the great commotion of the war scarcely interrupted or diverted it. There had been much talk of an esprit nouveau springing up in France, an idealistic movement which was to unite all Frenchmen under a new dispensation of brotherly love.

It was a visionary fantasy invented by praiseworthy writers, mostly Parisian, and it had no foundation on facts, in a period which began with the bitter polemics connected with Dis-establishment and ended with the Caillaux-Calmette drama on the eve of the war. In the provinces there was no trace of it, either at the polling-booths, or among the industrious populations which care not for politics. The war came, and in half a week the whole nation was united by the real spirit of France, which was not an esprit nouveau, being as old as the word "patriotisme" in its modern sense.

Effects of the Mechanical Age

Under the new civilization, issue of the mechanical age and diffusing its influence over all countries, there is no place for that French idealism which prepared the ground for the great Revolution, and later determined the policy and fate of governments. The idealistic temperament may survive in France, just as traditionalism may linger in England. But "things are in the saddle and ride mankind." So neither one nor the other can have any practical efficacy in face of the mechanical invasion. This has been in progress for a hundred years, but up to the present century its results in the way of rapid communication and locomotion were chiefly economical. Now so pervading has the movement become that it is changing to one uniform standard all the social, material, and moral conditions of human life, regardless of frontiers—the only bar to complete assimilation being difference of language.

The war, instead of checking the movement, took possession of it, and notified that henceforth the instruments of peaceful progress were not the only trophies of the mechanical age. It now produced the direst engines of slaughter—the aeroplane, the tank, the gas-bomb, the submarine—which removed the conditions of the Great War farther from those of the wars of Napoleon and Nelson than the latter were from those of the pre-gunpowder era. The "furia francese," which was a glorious expression of the spirit of France on the battlefield, had to give way to a colder courage less in accord with the French temperament.

Before the Great War the spirit of France was being sensibly affected by the peaceful progress of mechanical invention. Those who doubted it are now convinced by the results of its precipitate advance since the war. In Paris, the usurpation of the handsome thoroughfares by motor-traffic is changing the mentality of the capital, with its far-reaching influence throughout France. Though a most industrious city, Paris was the pleasant home of flânerie—not merely the pastime of idlers or sightseers, but the resource and the solace of the busy man of letters, the philosopher, and the artist.

THE SPIRIT OF FRANCE

How many problems have been discussed in the course of a stroll on the Boulevards, or the Champs Elysées, or of a ramble from the Latin Quarter to Montmartre? How often have such walks been described in memoirs and romances? Nevermore will they be so recorded. The Boulevards are so dead as a social resort that it is threatened to bury them in a subway for foot passengers. The once sumptuous panorama of the Champs Elysées resembles an overcrowded railway track. So the rash pedestrian who dares to discuss philosophy as he paces the Parisian asphalt, or to muse on the fancies of his imagination—often inspired by the scene of old Paris—finds that sauntering has become a capital offence in its former sanctuary.

Menace to French Traditions

The French were always the most animated people in Europe, with vivacity which attained to fury in times of trouble. But from the spirit of France in normal times proceeded animation without haste, and vivacity without hustle, a quality reflected in French literature. Now, while promenaders on the surface of Paris are the prey of constant peril, half the population takes part in the violent rush of the underground railway, where the tearing crowds have lost all Parisian characteristics, and the influence is contagious. After the war an historic theatre revived Regnard's exquisite comedy, "Attendez moi sous l'Orme," a masterpiece of leisurely grace, and the actors, influenced by the spirit of the age, made movement of the play so rapid, that someone suggested that it should be called "Attendez moi sous le Métro."

This is only a trifling menace to the theatre compared with another cosmopolitan influence which is the direct result of scientific invention. The cinematograph threatens to impair an art in which France is supreme—the art of dramatic diction. It is the triumph of the gesture over the spoken word; the sacrifice of human speech in an art of which it is the essential complement to the limited needs of the deaf and dumb. The greatest actors in the world, the French, though animated in conversation, are on the stage sober of gesture. Napoleon asked Talma where he had learned the secret of restraint in his consummate art. He replied that it was at the Convention, where the most impassioned speeches, on which depended human lives, were delivered without gesticulation.

Perfection of Dramatic Diction

The spoken word in the theatre, which Talma acted, has been the pattern of eloquence for generations of Frenchmen. There is many a public speaker, unknown beyond his own region, who visits Paris, like the Abbé Guitrel, whom Anatole France brought up from the country to take a lesson of declamation at the Comédie Française. It will be a more deadly blow to the French tongue than its displacement as the language of diplomacy if ever its dramatic literature is degraded to be the framework for pantomimic antics—a change which would debase the national spirit hitherto nurtured on the representation of its classical masterpieces.

Influence of the Comédie Française

There is no more edifying spectacle in France than the Comédie Française, crowded on a fine Sunday afternoon by people of every class devoting their holiday to greet the recitation of familiar passages where Phèdre laments her lover, and Harpagon his money-box, with all the "jeu de théâtre" centuries old. The present is not one of the most brilliant epochs of the Comédie Française; but the popular success which attended its celebration of the tercentenary of Molière showed that the war has not deprived it of its tradition, which is threatened by other influences.

These observations do not apply to the contemporary drama. Of it, eminent French critics say that in common with all literature of to-day it has no distinctive characteristic to mark an epoch. The question arouses such keen interest in France that several "inquests" have been published, giving the opinions on the subject of the best-known writers of France.

THE SPIRIT OF FRANCE

Present State of Literature

Their general conclusion is somewhat as follows: Though the output of books has been large, and increased by numerous prizes offered by academies and other societies, the period since the war has not produced any literature which shows sign of reflecting any marked change in the spirit of France. Many "war books" have been written, some of them excellent, relating "anecdotes"—in the French sense—of the struggle at the Front, and of the existence of those left at home—chiefly women. But while much good literature has been published, there are no real symptoms of a new movement. The war surprised the nation at a moment of uncertain transition, when no definite route had been taken in literature or art, distinct from the tendencies of the old fin de siècle.

1822 and 1922

Some optimistic writers, who recognize that there is no literary movement to-day which reflects the changing spirit of France, and who hope that the present period of hesitancy will be succeeded by a characteristic era, draw a parallel with the situation a hundred years ago. Then also there was no distinctive literary movement, while a wonderful epoch of productiveness was at hand rivalling in splendour the Grand Siècle, movement succeeding movement, reflecting the varying moods of the spirit of France till the century's end. But there is no analogy between 1822 and 1922 on which to build up hopes.

In 1822 France had just emerged from a long convulsion the like of which no nation had ever survived. The Revolution, with the violent abolition of the old regime, the reconstruction of France by Napoleon, and under his lead the conquest of continental Europe, had transformed the spirit of France, and the generation which assisted at this tumultuous renaissance had no time for literary action, though there were signs of something coming.

There was the disorganization of the classical ideal, that projection of the spirit of France which had influenced Europe for a century and a half, until Europe itself was reorganized by the French Revolution. It was a new and rejuvenescent France in 1822, with no points of similarity between it and the post-war France of to-day, which was about to begin a new and peaceful conquest of civilization. Its first operation was the Romantic movement, a reaction against the old classical ideal, which was encouraged by the example of English literature.

The New Idealism

There are British influences again at work in France, but, alas, in a different direction to that movement which inspired Chateaubriand to say: "It is Walter Scott who made the Revolution of 1830." It is to be feared that these new influences may have a more injurious effect on the spirit of France and on its language even than the loss in the war of a sad number of young writers who gave the brightest promise of illustrating French literature and of perhaps initiating a new school.

Formerly the French reprobated the English because they were addicted to drink and to prize-fighting, drunkenness and boxing being signs of a brutal temperament. Since then British insobriety has a rival in French alcoholism, while the prize-ring has become a high altar of French patriotism. This is no exaggeration.

After the general election of 1919 the Deputies of Alsace and Lorraine came to the Chamber to take their seats. It was a pathetic spectacle to see them on their way to sit in the French Parliament from which they had been excluded since 1871, and a respectable little crowd assembled to hail

MEN WHO HELP TO MAINTAIN THE SPIRIT OF VILLENEUVE

Unlike the French army, the sister service, still animated by the traditions of its historic past, is recruited to a large extent from volunteers, the majority of whom come from Brittany. The three "matelots" in the photograph are standing on the quay at Villefranche, an important naval station whose white houses nestle amid olive-covered hills overlooking the Mediterranean in their persons the restitution of the annexed provinces.

Photo, Donald McLeish

THE SPIRIT OF FRANCE

But that same day Paris saw another patriotic sight on a more grandiose scale. At the Gare du Nord there arrived a French pugilist, fresh from a victory in England. If a few hundreds cheered Alsace-Lorraine re-entering the Palais Bourbon, thousands of the democracy of Paris gave the prize-fighter a welcome more boisterous than any received by a marshal of France returning from the battle-ground. If this manifestation did not point to the decline of idealism in France, it showed at least that French ideals are changing their bases, with transforming consequences to the spirit of France.

Culture Sacrificed to Muscularity

More widespread than the popularity of boxing is that of a less unwholesome English import—football. Its vogue extends to climates in France not favourable to sweltering games. One has to live in a southern town, where the heat is greater in February than in an English May, to realise how British sport has taken hold of the youth of France. Throughout the land they read few books. The bookseller's shop, once a sort of literary club in a country town, has gone. The numbers of students in the higher faculties are decreasing. The French are becoming a nation of athletes on the English model, and the State is munificently endowing the new religion. Critics protest against this revolution which is sacrificing Latin culture to Anglo-Saxon muscularity.

The Jargon of Sport

An eminent patron of the athletic movement admits that "Les championnats de sport, la fièvre du ring de boxe, la violence du football, excluent la méditation indispensable aux choses de l'esprit." These words are quoted not only for the sound sense disguised in Anglo-French jargon, but as an example of the vitiating influence of English sport in the French language, even when used by a learned member of the Institute.

In the past the lingo of the Turf was imported from England for racing purposes, but this was seen only on the back sheets of newspapers, and was rarely used outside Paris and its environs. It is more serious when literary journals of wide circulation are full of distortions of the French language, such as those just quoted from a cultured pen. It seems as though the price which France has to pay for cultivating muscular cosmopolitanism is nothing less than the sacrifice of its language, the noble organ of the spirit of the nation, which is bound to deteriorate if the purity of that organ is permanently impaired.

An important feature of the cult of athleticism is its extension to women. It has made such progress since the introduction of lawn tennis as a game for girls thirty years ago that the "Education physique et sportive de la jeune fille" is now an article of educational programmes, and will soon be recognized by the State. The training of French girls in physical exercises is said to have improved already the physique of the race. In giving them a certain measure of freedom it facilitated the movement of feminine emancipation which came with the war.

Emancipation of Women in France

Some French writers (though theirs is perhaps an exaggerated view) regard this movement as the only social change caused directly by the war. Till then the majority of young French girls were still Verlaine's "ingénues aux bandeaux plats qui vivent presque inconnues dans les romans."

The emancipation of the unmarried girl which advanced during the war has nothing in common with the political emancipation of women in England. Few French women in any class want to vote or to have anything to do with politics, for which they have a wholesome contempt. Though the Bar was thrown open to women years ago the female advocate arouses no interest. The movement of so-called emancipation caused by the war has affected chiefly the well-to-do classes whose daughters saw how English girls, always less restricted than themselves, were in hospitals and in ambulances even in the battle line, attaining an unprecedented degree of liberty, of which the most revolutionary feature, from the French point of view, was the suppression of the chaperon.

THE SPIRIT OF FRANCE

This social upheaval, creating a new type of maiden in the cultivated classes, who have considerable influence on the tone of literature, cannot fail to effect a change in the spirit of France. At the same time it affects only a small proportion of the female population. The millions of French women who form the backbone of France grew up without the protection of chaperons. It is they who in town and country have "run" the serious business of France. The shops, the inns, the big farms, the little peasant properties, when prosperous, owe their prosperity to women.

State Education of Women

In England, some of the worst cases of shirking military service were in rural districts, where labourers were exempted on the excuse that if they were not kept at home agriculture would perish. Not so in France. There the women accomplished the work of the men sent to the Front, being before that emergency already skilled in all the productive labours of the country-side—digging, ploughing, sowing, and reaping—illustrating the spirit of France, of which few of them had ever heard, just because it was their duty and habit.

It would need a volume to tell of the different ways in which the women influence and mould the spirit of France. Changes are ahead, and they will not be like those produced by the feminist movement in England. One of the greatest importance has been on the way for some years. It is the changed outlook of women of every class owing to the development of higher education. How is this going to affect the generality of women? One point among many is of special interest. A new generation of women, except a minority who attended the Catholic Ecoles Libres, has been educated in State schools, elementary and secondary, without religious teaching.

At home they have for the most part been brought up religiously. Baptized in infancy, their First Communion has been celebrated with all the ceremony which makes that rite the most important of family festivals, even when the father is anti-clerical. But if afterwards a girl enters a secondary school the influences there are usually "laic." Is this then producing a new type of young French woman, and if so what influence will it have on the spirit of France?

The Church

In the anti-clerical days of Gambetta and Jules Ferry it was said that if French women had had the franchise they would have voted a war with Italy for the restitution of the temporal power of the Pope. The women of France, now as then, do not want a vote for any purpose, but if they were compelled to exercise it they would probably be far from unanimous in accepting political direction from their spiritual advisers, as did their mothers and grandmothers.

The question of the Church in relation to the spirit of France is also one which cannot be dealt with in a page. Here, no doubt, the war has made a sensible difference. On the eve of it the anti-clericalism which had broken the Concordat and dissolved the religious associations was losing some of its bitterness. But there was no serious reaction in view. The war came, and when thousands of French youths were dying every day the churches were filled by those who were left behind, chiefly sorrowing women.

The War and Tolerance

When the war ended the churches were frequented by men in greater numbers than had been seen for years, many of them soldiers who had come through the war. This was remarked not only in regions where religious observance is traditional, as in Brittany. At Bordeaux, a typical city of moderate opinion, the great cathedral was crowded with congregations exclusively of men, whenever a popular preacher was announced.

THE SPIRIT OF FRANCE

This is not to say that there were definite signs of a religious revival in France. It was rather that, from the anguish for the dead and the joy for those who had come back, a spirit of tolerance was passing over the nation.

Gallant Conduct of the Clergy

This new spirit was encouraged by the gallant conduct of the clergy in the war. The military service of priests and of seminarists, ardently opposed by the bishops and the clericals, had turned out to be a blessing for the Church.

Had the priests been exempted from war service as ministers of religion were in Britain they would have been treated, however unjustly, as licensed traitors and cowards. As it was, when a village curé, even in an anti-clerical region, fell before the enemy he was revered as a martyr; and when he returned from the war, maimed or wearing a ribbon won for valour, he became the hero of the parish, the bitterest free-thinker not daring to insult him.

The situation in Alsace-Lorraine was also matter for consideration. There, under German rule, the Church had been treated handsomely in contrast to the harassing policy of the French Republic. It would never do to allow the satisfaction of the populations, brought back to France, to be marred by the feeling that in matters of religion they were exchanging a regime of favour and prosperity for one of neglect and irritation.

Relations with the Vatican

So for this and other reasons the French government took advantage of the conciliatory spirit passing over the nation by renewing diplomatic relations with the Vatican. It was a pity that the Concordat could not have been restored also. But the Senate, which reflects the fundamental opinion of the nation more faithfully than the fluctuating Chamber, so opposed the appointment of an ambassador to the Papal Court and the reception of a

Nuncio in Paris—even threatening to refuse the vote for the expenses of the Roman mission—that the government saw it had gone to the farthest limit of braving the anti-clerical tradition of the Republic.

One difficulty the government had to contend with was the public belief that the Vatican under the late Pope, during the war, had been a German agency hostile to France. This impression was not removed by the enigmatic utterances of the Holy See under a new pontificate. It took a paradoxical form one day at the Chamber when a pacifist deputy, in pleading for collaboration with Germany, quoted in support of his argument a papal declaration, which produced the singular spectacle of the Extreme Left loudly applauding the utterance of the Sovereign Pontiff. This did not mean that the Radicals and Socialists were contemplating the restoration of the Concordat and the return of the monks. It only signified that the Holy See, by its ambiguous language at the time of the conference at Genoa, had seemed to favour not only Germany but also the Bolsheviks of Russia.

Socialism

The mention of the parties of the Extreme Left raises the question of the extent to which Socialism exercises influence on the spirit of France at the present day. Politically, it has less power than at any period of this century. The Socialist groups in the Chamber have fewer members than in previous parliaments, though elections for local bodies have shown a certain increase in the Socialist vote. But, generally speaking, Socialism is a less serious danger in France than in England. The addition to its groups by the introduction of new organizations labelled "Communist" or "Bolshevist" has not strengthened its representation in parliament.

In England there is always an exaggerated idea of the strength of Socialism in France. It dates from the Insurrection of the Commune in 1871, which even a well-informed writer like Lecky, mistaking the meaning of the word

THE SPIRIT OF FRANCE

"Communard," called the "Communist Revolution." It had nothing to do with Communism, being a movement in favour of communal autonomy, which if successful would have made the Commune of Paris, with its revolutionary elements, supreme in France. But though Karl Marx blessed it as a revolutionary movement, it was not founded on the doctrine associated with his name.

The obstacles to the serious advance of Communistic Socialism in France have been, first, the individualist character of the French, derived from the great Revolution, which defended the principle of property in the Declaration of the Rights of Man; and, second, the institution of peasant-proprietorship, which has been a strong defence against the theory of State-ownership of the land. The pure doctrine of the Revolution is rarely discussed nowadays; and as for peasant-proprietorship, small properties have been divided and subdivided into such minute parcels, under the testamentary laws, that they are becoming too small to give much sense of landowning to the proprietors.

Socialism in Rural France

This is one of the reasons why the peasant in regions where minute subdivision has operated is found to be amenable to the plausible Socialist doctrine which has made sensible progress in certain rural districts. The propaganda is sometimes found to have its origin in the proximity of industrial centres where trade unions are active. In one entirely rural department where the peasantry had become very prosperous after the war, a wave of communistic theory (not practice) invaded it, which was traced to the influence of Spanish and Italian workmen employed in iron works just beyond the departmental boundary.

An unlooked-for feature of rural Socialism to-day is that it is most popular where the peasants are richest. Their sudden increase of wealth, instead of promoting content, seems to impel them to desire for more. This they dream of obtaining by the application of Socialistic doctrines, which they fatuously imagine will minister to their increasing love of luxury. Easily-earned money and easy means of communication, by the motor traffic which has destroyed the peace of the beautiful rural roads of France, and has facilitated access to the towns where there is every temptation to squander, are having an injurious influence on the saving habits of the peasant.

Paper Currency and Frugality

One minor cause of this is curious. Travellers are familiar with the paper money which since the war has flooded France—once the storehouse of gold and silver. The dirty little scraps bearing the names of Bayonne, Périgueux, Caen, and scores of other country towns which have a Chamber of Commerce authorized to issue the debased currency, are not adapted for hoarding in the proverbial stocking. So when a peasant has received on market day, instead of a bag of gold and a pile of substantial crown-pieces a squalid packet of notes, he loses account of their value and is willing to squander at all events the low denominations of the paper currency, in defiance of the tradition which, by the saving frugality of the people, has made France the richest of nations. If the new coinage has come too late to check the habit, and if moved by other influences, the French peasant ceases to save and to be the stand-by of the nation when public funds are needed, a change in the spirit of France will take place, the operation of which is impossible to forecast.

In the foregoing pages it has been possible to give only some slight indications of the tendencies of the Spirit of France after the war. The effects of that great disturbance will not improbably be merged in the world-wide revolution of the mechanical age, which is internationalising all peoples; and it can hardly be hoped that it will leave intact the Spirit of France which for five centuries has had a paramount influence on the history of civilization.

"MONSIEUR LE MAIRE" SIGNS LEGAL DOCUMENTS AT HIS OFFICE
Though often of very humble birth, the French mayor is both the representative of the local commune and the agent of the central government. He is elected by a municipal council consisting of from ten to thirty-six persons chosen by universal suffrage. The life of the mayor is a busy one, for his people turn to him to settle questions of all sorts, and he is head of the local police

France

I. Social Life Under the Third Republic

By Hamilton Fyfe

Special Correspondent in France during the Great War

THE first thing to be said about the French people is that they are wrongly called a Latin people. There is a strong Latin element in them, which comes out in their subservience to bureaucracy, in their preference for ideas which are logical and four-square, and their distrust of the mystical, the "huge, cloudy symbols of high romance" which mean so much to the English race. But their descent and their spiritual make-up are more Celtic than Latin.

They are different from the peoples of the Celtic fringe, who have been pushed on to the fringe by more energetic stocks. The French are the Celts who have remained in the centre and prospered. To the Englishman the very term Celtic suggests failure in the material sense. German writers have gone so far as to suggest that the Celts have no right to exist. These judgements leave the French out of account. In France we can study the Celt in prosperity, the Celt who has dropped poetry and become a smiling, shrewd materialist.

It is the materialism of the French which has made them the most civilized people in Europe. They live in and for the world. Few of them, if we except the Bretons, have any real belief in the supernatural. They aim at getting the best out of this life, and they succeed in that endeavour better, on the whole, than any of their neighbours. Contrast the French peasant or labourer with those who belong to the same classes in England. The Frenchman carries himself like the equal of all the world, though without any boorish assertiveness. He works hard, perhaps not so hard as the Englishman, but with more zest. He is far better nourished, and he gets vastly more enjoyment out of his food. He shows an appreciation of pleasant forms, colours, and buildings. He takes off his hat to no man as an acknowledgment of inferiority. He takes it off to every man, as well as to every woman, in order to show his respect for them—and for himself.

Here is a sketch of the French peasant, made by a writer who knew him well, P. G. Hamerton:

Ignorant, but full of intelligence, his manners are excellent, he has delicate perceptions, he has tact, he has a certain refinement which a brutalised peasantry could not possibly have. If you talk to him at his own home or in his field, he will enter into conversation with you quite easily, and sustain his part with a pleasant combination of dignity and quiet humour. The interval between him and a Kentish labourer is enormous.

OLD BRETON WEAVER

He belongs to the little pine-clad mountain village of Sainte-Barbe, in Southern Brittany, famous for its fifteenth-century chapel and its annual Pardon

"OLD FASHIONS PLEASE ME BEST."

The Norman peasants are a conservative people and still preserve many of the costumes of their ancestors, and this high headdress, daintily arranged with lace and fine muslin, is a picturesque addition to the women's dress on festive occasions

Photo, Crété

All that is no less true to-day than it was in the middle of last century. I have known the French peasant and small farmer for a generation, and he does not seem to me to have changed in any way. I talked to any number of them while I was in France during the Great War. We discussed every kind of subject. I recollect one whose acquaintance I made while he was ploughing. He stopped his horses and asked me to tell him what was the religion of the English people. We had quite a discussion about religion generally. He was a Catholic. His views were those of a sensible, open-minded man. Whether they are townsmen or countrymen, the French of the manual labouring class still justify Matthew Arnold's commendation of them :

The common people in France seem to me the soundest part of the French nation. They seem to me more free from the two opposite degradations of multitudes—brutality and servility—to have a more developed human life, more of what distinguishes elsewhere the cultured classes from the vulgar, than the common people in any other country with which I am acquainted.

I shall probably astonish many people by attributing the civilized character of the French to their family life. It is the belief of the mass of the English that family life is unknown in France. It is often observed with smug self-satisfaction that "they have no word for home." The truth is that the family is in France a more important, a more respected, and a more influential institution than it is, or ever was, in England. It has actual power over its members.

The conseil de famille (family council) can take in hand a spendthrift and prevent him from ruining those dependent upon him. Its decisions can be enforced, if need be, by the law.

As for the power which is not legal, but sentimental, that is exercised in the French family to an extent which in England is very rare indeed. A French mother is worshipped by her sons. She is their playfellow in childhood, their confidante in youth, their idol when they have reached man's estate. She makes allowances for their small vices, never preaches at them, scolds only in a petting tone, interests herself in all that interests them, and is rewarded by a devotion such as English mothers seldom inspire. A Frenchman will turn in difficulties more readily to his mother than to his father. He knows he can be sure, whatever fault or folly he may have committed, of her sympathy and assistance.

FRANCE & THE FRENCH

Children of the comfortable class (as well as of other classes) live more with their parents in France than they do in England. They have their meals with their father and mother, not in the nursery. They are allowed and even encouraged to take part in general conversation. They are not told "to be seen and not heard." They pick up at an early age the trick of talking with ease and wit about almost any subject that may be brought up. When a child makes a piquant comment or invents a neat phrase, father and mother laugh and applaud. The child quickly notices how to arouse laughter, how to win applause. Of course, there is a bad side to this. In some children it produces self-assertion and unwholesome desire to shine. But these results seldom follow. The social distinction of the French may be in great part accounted for by the

FRESH VEGETABLES FOR SALE IN QUIANT LISIEUX

Lisieux, in Normandy, contains some of the most picturesque old houses in France, notably the Maison de François Premier in this street, the Rue aux Fèvres, and others in the Rue d'Orbiquet and the Rue des Boucheries. The peasant woman seen in the photograph, wearing the ordinary Norman costume, is hawking vegetables grown on her own small holding

Photo, George Long

FINE RESULTS FROM SIMPLE MEANS

No town laundry can turn out linen rivalling in whiteness that beaten with bats in the open air by the peasant women of the Sologne, and afterwards rinsed in the running streams and dried in the sunshine and clean wind social training which children get in almost every home, not only among the rich, but among the poor.

Photo, Crété

They have an instinct for whatever is agreeable. Their manners are said to lie merely on the surface. For the common intercourse of life that is enough. They prefer to be pleasant in their speech and looks, to make an attractive rather than a repellent impression. They take pains to express themselves with clarity and exactness. They are gratified by agreeable sights, by orderly and spacious streets and public buildings, by the green of parks and public gardens. There are touches of neatness and tasteful decoration to be found in the poorest French homes.

A French writer who had made a study of the common lodging-houses of London and Paris said he had been struck by a "certain dim striving among French outcasts who frequented such shelters towards cleanliness and tidiness and even towards taste." In the London doss-houses he found nothing of this kind. There are no slums in French cities comparable in squalor and repulsiveness with those which stain the character of the British and Irish races. There is always something to redeem the dwellings even of the very poor from the desolation and the abandonment of all effort in the direction of decency and order which sadden one in almost every big centre of population in the British Isles.

The French workman would lose his self-respect if he were seen in the streets, or even in his home, dirty and unkempt.

The French woman makes it a point of honour to keep her rooms clean and tidy, to have a place for everything and everything in its place. That is the tradition which she has inherited. I know several "lodges" of concierges in Paris (I mean the tiny apartments allotted to the men and women who, as the guardians of the entrances to blocks of flats and offices, play so prominent a part in the drama of Parisian existence) which are always clean, orderly, and even charming. In the morning my friend madame la concierge looks fresh and neat. She has her family ready for school in good time, well brushed, well booted, well nourished by their basins of

BRETON MUSICIANS AND THE MELANCHOLY BINIOU

At nearly every country fête and holiday gathering in Brittany the peasants may be seen dancing the national gavotte to music supplied by players of the native bagpipe (or biniou) and a flageolet. The Breton bagpipe differs in several respects from the Scottish national instrument, and to the unaccustomed ear its sounds are of a rather melancholy, even dismal kind

UNDERGOING OUT-OF-DOORS TREATMENT AT MORBIHAN

Beside his whitewashed cottage wall an aged Breton is undergoing massage treatment at the hands of a fellow-countryman gifted by nature with a knowledge of the human frame. In this department of Lower Brittany the majority of the men follow the call of the sea, and the women are said to possess the privilege of proposing marriage

Photo, Cr  

OLD-TIME COSTUMES AT A MODERN BRETON WEDDING

Breton peasants cling as closely to old costumes and customs as they do to the old faith, and the newly-wedded couple at the church porch, dressed in the gala garb of their district, exemplify these national traits, for all Breton life has the local church as its centre, while the people are Bretons first, and French citizens by force of circumstances

FRANCE & THE FRENCH

milk and good bread. She goes out to do her shopping with her hair exquisitely smooth, wearing a big overall, carrying a big basket. She has always a pleasant word to spare and a smile to brighten the day with. That is the most prevalent type of French womanhood.

Before her husband died she looked after his business, wheedled hesitating customers, kept the accounts. In small businesses it is generally the wife who does that and who keeps as watchful an eye upon all transactions of trade as she does upon household affairs. Many a man owes his success in money-making to his wife's sagacity and advice. French women are born with an instinct for small economies which sometimes they permit to make them miserly. But this instinct is largely accountable for that love of regularity and trimness which gives their homes so attractive an air.

To the beauty which arouses deep emotion they are less susceptible than the English, even the uncultivated English. A slum-dweller from London or Manchester can be reduced to silent wonder by the first sight of the ocean. At exhibitions of pictures in White-chapel I have seen the roughest East-enders moved in their rough way by gracious colour and form. The French like Nature best when she has her hair

VILLAGE SCENE IN THE OLD FRENCH PROVINCE OF NORMANDY

What was once Normandy has been divided since 1791 into the departments of Seine-Inférieure, Manche, Calvados, Eure, and Orne. It is famous for its rich, moist pasture lands, apple orchards, white and freckled cows, and horses. All the inhabitants of this village were equally willing to confront the camera as representatives of rural France at its best waved and her broad bosom compressed by corsets. They like Art to represent rather than to interpret, to make its meaning very plain. The French student in Rossetti's "Hand and Soul" who declares that anything which he does not understand cannot have any meaning, speaks for his countrymen generally.

Photo, Underwood Press Service

It is not, therefore, so much an aesthetic impulse which makes the French home agreeable, and the French people careful in their dress, and the French town or city attractive. It is rather a national self-respect. The Revolution endowed the nation with this quality. Although it may often seem that there is in reality no more Liberty, Fraternity or Equality in France than there is elsewhere, yet one does find illustrations of the two latter at any rate, often enough to justify the national motto. There is not the same difference in the standards of life as prevails in England. The mass of English artisans and labourers consider themselves still the "inferiors" of those whom they call "the upper classes." It seems to them part of the natural order of things that those who do not work, or those who sit in offices and wear white collars, should have more dainty and expensive food to eat, should keep themselves cleaner and wear better clothes, should amuse themselves expensively and look down upon all who belong to a lower class than they do.

French artisans and labourers are under no such illusion. They know that, in spite of differences in station and wealth, all men are equal. Miss Hannah

BRETON INNKEEPER'S CHEERY WELCOME

As he stands in the sunlight at the doorway of the little auberge, inviting the passer-by to refreshment in the dim interior, he offers a welcome that would make even indifferent liquor palatable

Photo, Cr  

Lynch, in an amusing book upon her life in France, tells of a miller and his wife who were friends of hers, and to whom one day, as they were preparing dinner, the miller being given the task of basting the roast chicken, she related the story of King Alfred and the neglected cakes. The wife was, or pretended to be, shocked. "What? She struck a king, and she a peasant like me!" To which the miller replied with: "Ah, it doesn't make much difference whether a woman is queen or peasant. She's always a woman."

That reflection summed up the French attitude towards distinctions of rank.

FRANCE & THE FRENCH

The miller would no doubt have said the same about a peasant and a king. "They are both men, after all." This explains the bearing of the Frenchman, however humble his occupation may be. He carries himself with the assurance of one who moves among his equals. There is no servility in him, as Matthew Arnold pointed out. He may envy those who fare more luxuriously than he and his family, but he will not curry favour to be found among the French middle class. These are the upstarts who slip a "de" in front of their names so as to deceive people into supposing they are of noble birth. The "de," like the German "von," suggests that you possess land, that you are So-and-so of Such-a-place, and that your land has descended to you from a long line of illustrious ancestors. These were the fools who in years gone by supported the

VINTAGE TIME IN THE SOLOGNE: GATHERING THE GRAPES

Lying south of Orléans, between the Loire and the Cher, the plateau known as the Sologne was devastated and depopulated during the wars of religion and degenerated into an unhealthy marshy region. Since about 1860 there has been extensive reclamation, and now once more the plateau is supporting an industrious population engaged in farm work and the culture of the vine with them by acknowledging them as his "betters."

Photo, Crété

There is still an aristocracy in France which assumes superiority and clings to the notion that a traceable long descent from ancestors who have borne titles ennobles. These people are laughed at, but at the same time there is still respect paid to them. The climbers of the bourgeoisie snobbishly venerate them. The writer who says that snobbery is peculiar to England is quite clearly unacquainted with France. There is no snob more snobbish than those who are idea of restoring the monarchy, who made a show of piety because it was fashionable to go to church; who took sides against Dreyfus and in favour of the ridiculous claim to infallibility set up by the officers of the French Army because the real aristocrats were militarist.

But there is another and a far more honourable kind of respect shown to the marquises and counts and barons, and even more to the marchionesses and countesses and baronesses, by those who are brought into relation with

SECOND STAGE IN WINE-MAKING: DRAINING OFF THE MUST

Grapes for wine-making are picked by hand when ripe and dry. The stalks are removed and the juice is expressed by means of rollers, or by a lever, or screw press. In some places they are still pressed by trampling underfoot. The juice, or must, is then drawn-off and exposed to fermentation. For the very finest wines only juice expressed by the weight of the grapes themselves is used.

Photo, Crété

WHERE THE CAPS AND COLLARS OF THE BRETON WOMENFOLK ACQUIRE THEIR SNOWY WHITENESS
 The inhabitants of the little town of Douarnenez, in the department of Finistère, are principally engaged in the sardine fisheries. But even in the height of the fishing season the Breton women find time to attend to their laundry work, and in this open-air washhouse large numbers of them may be seen in kneeling attitudes, vigorously rubbing the clothes on the flat stone edge of the capacious water-basin, carrying on an animated conversation the while them. This is a respect extorted by their kindness, by their good manners, by their admission through their behaviour (though by their words they may deny it) of the equality of all mankind. They treat their old servants as friends. They talk simply and unaffectedly with the peasants or with the men who polish the floors of their houses in the Faubourg St. Germain. And they continue to set a standard of manners which is recognized as a valuable contribution to the national character.

Photo, Crété

FRANCE & THE FRENCH

It was the aristocracy of France that created the characteristic that chiefly distinguishes the French people to-day. That class had grievous faults and suffered grievously, though not on the whole unjustly, for them. Let us do it justice. When Voltaire sought to sum up in a phrase the gift to the world from the age of Louis XIV., he said that this gift was the social spirit. The French aristocracy set up a high and a pleasant ideal of social intercourse and manners. That ideal persisted through the years of the Revolution, when so many other ideals were broken. Gradually it affected the mass of the French people, even the peasants who had been before the half-savage and scarcely human serfs of their feudal lords. All through the vicissitudes endured by the nation during the nineteenth century the social spirit spread to wider and wider circles of the population, until the "little leaven" left over from the age of the Grand Monarque "leavened the whole lump," and France became the most civilized nation of the western

SPLITTING LOGS WHERE KINGS HUNTED

He is a woodcutter employed in the wall-enclosed hunting forest surrounding the famous château built for himself by Francis I. at Chambard in Sologne—the finest Renaissance palace in existence hemisphere. Through all ranks of society there runs the desire to be correct. That is a word which is never applied in England to behaviour. In France it is commonly used to indicate whether a man is what we should call a "gentleman" or not. Whether he lounges in a drawing-room, how he receives a challenge to a duel, what he says to his wife when she upbraids him with being too fond of someone else, all such points, great and small, come under the heading of "correctness." The standard is too much like that which we used to apply to "gentlemen." It does not concern

Photo, Crété

TIRING LABOUR IN THE POTATO FIELDS

Breton peasants are hard and willing workers, labouring long hours in the fields all the year round. The women are as industrious as the men, playing a large part in the agricultural work that provides employment for so many. The peasants seen above are pulling up new potatoes which, to save damage, are unearthed by hand instead of by a fork

Photo, Cr  t  

WOMEN WINNERS OF THE GRAIN

Long sticks, jointed midway, the lower portion serving as a lash, are used by the peasant folk in the winnowing of the grain. The sturdy arms of the women are seasoned to this arduous exercise, a loose, swinging movement of the arm and a slight bend of the body being all that is required to keep the stick whirling as it descends to separate the grain from the chaff

PREPARING THE ROUGH HEMP FOR THE SPINNER'S WHEEL

This demure little French maiden hangs her head at the approach of the camera, but her downcast face is full of a shy pride that she is to stand for her portrait. On the rude wooden mangle the tough fibre obtained from the hemp plants grown on her father's small holding is being worked into a pliable condition prior to the spinning and weaving processes

MOURNING THEIR GIRL FRIEND: FUNERAL PROCESSION AT FOUESNANT

Sorrowfully this procession of young Breton girls winds its way towards the little cemetery, there to pay a last farewell to one who had been their companion at Pardon and play, and who had been so prematurely parted from them. In their white caps and dresses of the district, with candles guttering in the breeze, these girl mourners offer a sad contrast to the holiday life of the pleasant Breton summer resort of Fouesnant, near Quimper. Like many other simple folk, the Bretons and old Bretons derive much spiritual consolation from the outward manifestations of their faith.

UNSATED DEATH, WHOSE EVERY DAY IS CARNIVAL

The mourners are just entering the old church with which so many of the chief events of their lives are associated. On the pall is noticeable one of those little signs of Breton genius, a teardrop worked in white. The near relatives of the departed are wearing the curious hooded cloaks peculiar to the district. The lighted candles, the closed roundabout in the background, and the sunlit hills beyond afford a symbolical commentary on the ceremony that is going forward with the solemnity inseparable from Roman Catholic obsequies, be they of the well-to-do, or, as in this case, of a humble peasant itself with the feelings, but only with the outward appearances. Thus there is some truth, after all, in the reproach that French good manners are on the surface only.

Photo, Miss V. Onslow

FRANCE & THE FRENCH

Yet so pleasant are they that one may well ask oneself: What does it matter? We need probe beyond the surface so seldom. For all the ordinary relations of life outward civility suffices to keep the machinery running smoothly. We are horrified when we hear of well-dressed men fighting to get out of a building on fire before the women, and trampling on the women in their terror, as happened at a bazaar in Paris not many years ago. Perhaps we thank God and think in our self-righteous way that such a thing could not happen in England. But remember those were decadent Frenchmen of the aristocratic class, men accustomed to idleness and self-indulgence. Most Frenchmen in such an hour would behave quite as well as Englishmen. And, though we mercilessly condemn those aristocrats, there is this to consider: Is it not better that people should present a civilized and agreeable front to the world, even though they may fail in a moment of crisis, rather than be surly and disagreeable all their lives and most likely die without having had the opportunity to show that they had heroic stuff in them?

I put in this plea the more urgently because I am going on to admit that the French, or I would rather say Frenchmen, are not gifted with the same qualities of patience, kindness, tact, that some other nations possess. They are not helpful to foreigners struggling with their beautiful language. They do not suffer fools gladly. When it was known that French officers were to be sent to Rumania as instructors in gunnery, aviation, defence against aircraft, and so on, the Rumanians were delighted. They consider themselves nearly related to the French. "It will be delightful," they said, "for the French are almost our brothers." After these officers had been in the country a little while the Rumanians changed their tune. They used to come to me and say: "How much better it would be if we had had British officers to instruct us!" The French officers found the Rumanians

SIMPLE PAGEANTRY OF THE HUMBLE BRETON FUNERAL

The sombre black-plumed hearse that is so distinguishing a feature of the funerals of the well-to-do in France has been replaced by a much less imposing vehicle, for the poor cannot afford many outward signs of sorrow. The procession, headed by a cross-bearer and clergy, is representative of the deep-grained piety that is inherent in the Bretons and does so much to reconcile this people to their hard life

Photo, Miss V. Onslow

WHERE RELIGION IS PART OF EVERYDAY LIFE

Many of the churches in Brittany are ancient, most are extraordinarily beautiful, and the intensely religious character of the people, illustrated in this photograph of Bretons leaving church after Mass, finds few parallels outside Ireland. The pure faces of the women, the serious observance of Mass and of marriage, speak eloquently of the essential morality of the Breton people incompetent, and despised them for it. They thought them stupid, and did not try to conceal their opinion. Russians have suffered not less uncomfortably from French contempt for what seems to them defective intelligence. The Parisian always makes Paris his standard. In general it may be said that a Frenchman unfavourably contrasts what he finds in other countries with what he has left behind in France. He is accustomed to think that France leads the world in everything, the other nations toiling imitatively after her.

There is a certain amount of truth in this, just enough to make it annoying to the other nations, but it is by no means the whole truth, and in any case regard for the feelings of others should prevent it from being so loudly proclaimed. That regard is not a strong French characteristic, and the lack of it hinders the French from being successful as colonists. The most successful colonists are the British and the Russians. The British try to look at innovations from the natives' point of vision; they do this for reasons of policy, because they know their business will advance more rapidly if the natives work with them instead of against them. The Russians act in the same way, not from interest but from sympathy; their humanity is wide and deep enough to ensure their getting on well with any race of human beings. French colonial administration is not sympathetic, nor do the French colonists really settle in the lands they develop or exploit. Their intention is to return to France as soon as they have made enough money to purchase them moderate comfort at home.

In the French colonies, as in France itself, officialism is carried to a length which probably does more to check than to further the execution of the matters in hand. A French writer has denounced as the curse of his country "l'abus de la paperasserie," the overdoing of formalities, the plague of official papers. All contact with authority reveals the complication attached to even the most trivial pieces of public business. There appears to be a love of this complication

WHEN WEDDING BELLS WERE RINGING AT PLOUGASTEL, IN NORTHERN FINISTÈRE

This gay little nuptial procession is passing through a street in Plougastel, Finistère, one of the four departments into which modern Brittany is divided. Here it is a time-honoured custom for all marriages to take place during the month of January, before the work in the fields and fisheries begins. Relatives and friends from neighbouring districts begin to arrive at dawn; the church ceremony takes place as a rule early in the morning, and the remainder of the day is devoted to high festival in the home of the newly-married. On these occasions the men and women don their brightest costumes

Photo C. 184

LAST VESTIGE OF THE ANCIENT FEASTS OF THE DEAD: THE BRETON PARDON

While all are characterised by devout observance, the Breton Pardons, like Breton costumes, vary in different districts, but they are intimately associated with the lives of the people from infancy to old age. Some attract the religious from far and near; others are local to some little church or shrine. They are held on saints' days. The procession passes from the church through the streets to the scene of the ceremony, often an open field. To bear the reliquary of the patron saint, or the richly-wrought banners, is a task of special distinction. Our photograph shows preparations for one of these processions in progress for its own sake, an ingenious invention of obstacles in the way of transacting affairs rapidly or simply. When Napoleon created the bureaucratic machine which was, as he hoped, to keep his yoke fixed upon the neck of the French people, he did the country more harm than by all his wars. From the effects of war it could recover in a generation or so. The bureaucratic machine still pinches and hampers it to-day after more than a century has passed.

Photo, Miss V. Onslow

FRANCE & THE FRENCH

As happens with all governing classes, the bureaucracy imagines that the people were created in order to be ruled by it. It does not admit that it exists merely as a convenience, and that the official is the servant of the people. There is far more petty pomp and ostentation among the office-holders of the French Republic than could be found in certain monarchical States. The Republic has not, indeed, ever been really democratic. The prevalent idea behind it has not been the rule of the people, but the rule of officials. To take one example only, the chief authority in a French department is not, as in an English county, the chairman of a popularly-elected county council, but the prefect, who is appointed by the Government. Thus the Government can influence local administration all over the country; it usually appoints the prefects with this aim in view.

If there had been a strong democratic feeling in France, the country would not have financed the corrupt and oppressive autocracy of the Tsardom. The French people poured out their francs by the milliard to help keep the Russian people

VOTIVE OFFERING AT AN ANCIENT BRETON SHRINE

At this ancient shrine of the Virgin Mary at Plougasnou, notable architecturally for its supporting caryatides, young Breton girls sometimes come on Ascension Day to make a votive offering, and to pray that they may have husbands. Near by is the fifteenth-century church of Saint Jean-du-Doigt, where is preserved in an ancient casket what purports to be a finger of S. John

Photo Miss V. Onslow

FRANCE: A FLOWER OF NORMANDY

Character and pride of race show in her shapely figure and fine face as she stands with her pannier-laden donkey before the carved door of the richly-timbered Norman mansion

BUNK-LIKE BEDS OF A BRETON INTERIOR

In many Breton farmhouses the beds are placed in niches in the wall, one above the other, with sliding panels as doors that can be closed in the daytime. The snow-white linen for which the country is famous is often stored in a recess beneath the lower bed. On the wall near the bed, as in the above photograph, is frequently to be seen a little shrine in subjection. They cheered the Tsar when he went to Paris. They hailed the alliance between Republic and Despot as a safeguard for France against Germany, no one suspecting the rottenness of the system which looked strong and maintained a huge military force, but did not take precautions to provide it with enough rifles or enough shells.

Photo, Cr  t  

Heine said that the Englishman loved Liberty as his wife, while the Frenchman loved her as his mistress and the German as his old grandmother. Certainly the French have never shown a steady affection for Liberty. They allowed Napoleon to dominate them after the Revolution. They allowed the Allies to re-impose the Bourbon dynasty upon them after Waterloo. They voted by an enormous majority the sovereignty of Napoleon III. as a change from their Second Republic. Since that experiment ended so badly, they have had their Third Republic for just on fifty years, but not without alarums and excursions in the direction of monarchy again.

It is true that these effervescences have been in Paris, and it is a very great error to suppose that Paris represents France, although the strings of government are pulled from there. To find the French people you must go into the country and the country towns. In the farms, in the market-places, at the tables d'h  te of inns, in little places (d  jeuner at half-past ten in the morning, probably), outside the churches after Mass on Sunday morning, you will hear them discussing local affairs, and occasionally touching upon national problems. But there is no excitement, no eloquence, no following of every political move, such as you notice in the capital.

Paris has often made history, and very mischievous history, by acting quickly in a state of hysteria before the rest of France knew what was happening. For example, when Paris was shouting "To Berlin!" in 1870, seventy-one out of the eighty-seven departments into which the country was divided were for peace. Again, the Boulanger madness, when a flashy general came near being proclaimed dictator, was limited to Paris. To get at the mind and heart of France you must go among the cultivators of the soil.

It is they, with their unimaginative common sense, who have been the chief

TOIL-WORN BUT ROBUST SONS OF THE FRENCH SOIL

In their struggle for existence old age is the arch-enemy, but they will seldom own to being hors de combat, and long past the allotted span of life continue to till the earth which never fails to supply them with a scanty subsistence. Judging from the appearance of the peasant to the left, the "wear and tear" of life has played greater havoc with his homespun than with his sturdy frame

Photo, Cr  

FRANCE & THE FRENCH

BRETON MAYOR AT EASE

Passing strangers might not at first see in this quaintly-garbed figure, with roomy breeches, dark surcoat, and round hat, a person of importance. As mayor of a Breton village, he controls local affairs and acts as friend and adviser in many matters to his fellows support of the Republic. They are not specially attached to this form of government in the abstract. The Frenchman is above all else practical. He judges institutions by their results. And the peasants feel that the results of the Third Republic have been satisfactory. They feel that it is the safest system, the one under which property is more secure than it might be under another. That is what they principally ask of the men they choose to be Presidents and Ministers—not that they shall rule, for the officials do that, but that everyone shall be able to work and save and invest without being interfered with. They know that any change of system would be attended by disturbances. Therefore, even though they may not be altogether pleased with the system in possession, they rather bear the ills they have than fly to others they know not of.

Photo, Cr  

The French are the most saving of the nations. They cherish passionately the feeling of security that money gives. If they have not displayed the same devotion as the English to political liberty, they are vastly more jealous of their personal independence. The number of French families which have money invested is infinitely larger than the number in England. Among the English it is rare for those who earn

SOLACE OF TOBACCO

At her cottage door she presents a quaint picture in her tattered shawl and skirt and neat white close-fitting cap as she applies a match to the coarse tobacco in the bowl of her short clay pipe and enjoys the first comforting puffs

Photo, Cr  

FRANCE & THE FRENCH

weekly wages or receive small salaries to have any invested savings. In France it is common. The issue of public loans is so arranged as to offer facilities for the investment of small sums. There are shops where bonds can be bought must be ready if suitable husbands are to be attracted. Love matches have been a little more frequent in recent years, but the rule is still for marriages to be arranged by parents upon a financial basis. It is hard for

English people to believe that this can give such good results as their own system of unfettered choice, but it appears to be followed by quite as many successful unions as can be counted in England. I say "successful" rather than happy, because I do think that, while on the whole French husbands and wives get along comfortably together, and are more often partners in the fullest sense than are English married couples, yet they do not as often know the happiness of married life.

Of course, nobody who knows French life takes any of his ideas about it from the novels and plays which slander the nation by representing that all husbands and most wives are unfaithful, and that the chief occupation of them all is l'amour. There is not the same strict standard set up for men as the English have established, in appearance at any rate. But the men keep the standard for women strict enough, save in certain exceptional cases, of a character not unknown in England, where each agrees to let the other go his or her own way, only stipulating that there shall be no open scandal. In general, as I have said, French married folks live together contentedly, but more often than not without that warmth of affection, that steady glow lit from the flame of passion, which marks a marriage founded upon mutual attraction and preference, and

VIGOROUS AT FOURSORE

His upright carriage, clear eye, and sound health, all bear eloquent testimony to the benefits of a simple outdoor life spent among the fields in his beloved Brittany. He still delights to deck himself in the native finery across the counter just like cheese or sugar. Many a man and many a woman calls at a shop of this kind every week on pay-day to add some little amount to invested capital.

The incentive to save is twofold. There is first the anxiety to make provision for old age. Secondly, there is the necessity of putting by a dowry for each daughter who does not give up the idea of marriage and become a member of a religious order. The dowry

BRETON PARDON IN PROGRESS AMID THE GROWING CORN

Pardons are usually held near to some old chapel, sometimes amid fields of growing corn. Distinct from all other Christian observances, and regarded by some authorities as the last vestiges of the ancient Feasts of the Dead, they begin at dawn and are attended by all who have special blessings to pray for, or thanks to offer for blessings received

Photo, Crété

AT A BRETON CANNERY: SARDINES BEING PACKED IN TINS FOR EXPORT

When the sardine catch comes in it is taken without delay to the cannery, where, the viscera having been removed, the fish are soaked in brine, placed in wire baskets or on wooden trays to dry, next submerged in boiling oil, and then, after cooling, packed with spices in tin boxes, which are filled with oil and sealed. The sealed tins are afterwards immersed in boiling water for about two hours. The chief centres for the Breton sardine industry are Concarneau and Douarnenez, and the factories provide employment for about twenty thousand women and girls, who are distinguished for their neatness and tidiness of dress, as well as for their manual dexterity not in any way controlled by money considerations.

Photo, Crété

FRANCE & THE FRENCH

The frugality of the French, which is the accompaniment of their saving habit, has many advantages, not alone for the individual, but for the community as well. It accounted for the paying off of the war indemnity exacted by Germany in 1871 within a period much shorter than had been thought possible. It keeps down the number of persons who have to be supported by the State. But it has disadvantages, too. It is very often found to have degenerated into miserly or niggardly habits. Thrift is among certain classes of the country people, and among individuals in towns, a positive vice. Skimpiness is carried to the point where it is indistinguishable from meanness.

The French woman is a most capable manager, and she sometimes manages to pare her housekeeping down to the absolute minimum of well-being. This may occur in any class, but it is especially prevalent among women of peasant origin. The small landholders in Picardy worship economy. They stint themselves, not only of comforts to which their earnings entitle them, not only of pleasures, but of what is needed to make life a boon instead of a perpetual struggle and grind. They practise the French knack of making something out of nothing, though they are better nourished than large numbers of town English families; they know nothing of that jolly abundance which generally goes with English farm life—plenty of cream and butter, eggs and chickens, pork and bacon, home-made

NETFUL OF GLISTENING SILVER

Sardine fishing, on which the well-being of Brittany's fisherfolk so largely depends, is occasionally erratic in its rewards, but a good haul means goodly profit for owners and crew bread and cakes. I recall one amusing instance of the French skill in providing meals when no materials seem to exist. Bicycling once through the Loire country, the rich land of Touraine, I broke some essential part of my machine just about midday. The nearest town was many miles away, and though the railway was not far off, there was no train from the deserted station, built in the middle of a vast, uninhabited plain, until late in the afternoon. My brother and I looked ruefully at one another. We were very hungry after our breakfast of coffee and rolls. There seemed little chance of getting anything to eat. However,

Photo, Cr   

UNPLEASANT WORK FOR DELICATE NOSTRILS

In a corner of a sardine factory at Concarneau these girls are arranging the fish in wire trays for drying. Work in these factories is very unpleasant, owing to the smell of the fish and of the boiling oil, but the women get accustomed to it. On fête days these same women are famous for the fastidious neatness of their dresses, shoes, and smooth white caps with snowy lappets

Photo, Crété

CARRYING THE DAY'S CATCH FROM BOAT TO MARKET PLACE

Large fleets of small vessels are engaged in the sardine fishery, and a pretty annual custom at Douarnenez is the blessing of the sea and of the boats. The men shown here are taking their morning's catch into Concarneau market. Concarneau stands on an island in the Bay of La Forêt, and at high tide is completely surrounded by the sea, communication with the main land being kept up by a bridge

Photo, Miss V. Onslow

PROFITABLE USE OF LEISURE IN A BRETON FISHING VILLAGE

Breton women, when not employed in household chores, or at work in the fields, take knitting and needlework into the open air to the sunny side of a church or Calvary, or, as in the case of these fishermen's wives, to the corner of a quay, where they retail the gossip of the day as their nimble fingers engage in the kind of work reserved for their "leisure hours"

Photo, Miss V. Onslow

ANIMATION AT CONCARNEAU WHEN THE BOATS COME HOME WITH A GOOD HAUL OF TUNNY FISH

Thon, or tunny fish, which belong to the mackerel family, are caught by trolling with lines attached to poles extended over each side of the fishing craft. As soon as they are caught, these big fish are hung up on board to dry, and when the vessels, usually schooner-rigged, reach port, the catch is brought ashore in dinghies, the work of conveying the fish to the canning factory being taken part in by swarms of small boys. A cruise after tunny fish lasts several days. In addition to the tunny and sardine, the Breton fisheries yield lobsters, shrimps, and oysters

FRANCE & THE FRENCH

we searched about and came to a little roadside estaminet, where an old woman appeared in answer to our rappings on the door.

"Could we have lunch?" we inquired. "But certainly, yes," if we would give ourselves the trouble to step in and sit down for a little moment. We stepped in, and our hearts sank. There was not even a fire. But there was one in half a minute. The old with what we should have been offered in an English wayside public-house, if we had been offered anything at all. A knuckle of dried-up mutton or ham, a piece of hard cheese with yesterday's bread, served on a dirty table in a bar parlour smelling offensively of stale beer. This understanding and appreciation of the value of the small pleasures of life is what makes France so delightful a holiday-ground for those who wander off

READY FOR THE CANNERY AT CONCARNEAU

Concarneau, the name of which fishing port is on these crates of tunny fish ready for the cannery, is notable for its old fortifications and its fifteenth-century chapel of Notre Dame de Bon Secours, as well as for its canneries, and is a resort of artists. Near by, in the Château de Kerjolet, is a museum of the costumes and antiquities of Lower Brittany woman threw on a handful of twigs, bustled out, returned with half a dozen eggs, warm from the nests, held a pan over the blazing twigs, and made a perfectly delicious omelette. While we enjoyed this, she went out again, came in with what looked like an armful of weeds, and served us a most succulent salad. Then she produced from a cupboard two magnificent peaches and a bottle of some local home-made liqueur, which we sipped with her fragrant coffee.

Photo, Miss V. Onslow

A better lunch no reasonable man could have desired. We contrasted it the tourist track and find the real French people.

This people knows better than any other how to get the most enjoyment from every day's ordinary round. Arbeit und Liebe (Work and Love) is a very old recipe for contentment. The French certainly work with energy, and they spread their affections over a wide field. Mothers love their sons, fathers love their daughters, whatever the remaining family relations may be. Hoarding is loved, good living is loved, all the more because hoarding clashes with it and makes indulgence rare.

PREPARING GALA ATTIRE

Holiday dress of both men and women in Brittany is distinguished by elaborate embroidery, the work of skilled craftsmen, one of whom is here seen at work, at Pont l'Abbé, on a man's waistcoat

Photo, Crété

Independence is loved. Life is enjoyed with a zest and a savour.

This is true of all the differing stocks that make up the population of France. In the north you find the jolly, shrewd Norman, the small farmer of Picardy—making, as I have suggested, thrift almost a vice—the pious, tight-lipped Breton, the almost Dutch inhabitants of French Flanders, all working hard and putting away money, without giving much thought to anything outside the daily routine of their labour. In the centre of France the vineyards skilfully tended, and wine made with perfection of judgement, bear witness to the high intelligence, as well as the industry of Burgundians. Farther south, the same toll is taken of the soil with the same steady application, and you find the same wise household management and care. Everything the French think it worth while to do—that is to say, everything which promises a sure return for their money and their trouble—they do well. Look at the contrast between the French and the Italian Riviera. As far as Ventimiglia, nothing is neglected that can add to the amenity of the coast, to the comfort and convenience of the visitor. Cross the frontier, and there is noticeable immediately a slackness, a can't-be-bothered attitude. The railway is allowed to run between the towns and the sea, spoiling the enjoyment of the coast. Instead of pleasant order there is, in general, a disregard for the finer aspects of utility. This you scarcely ever find in France. You may lament the dirty, uncared-for condition of a town of historic interest like Aigues-Mortes, but there visitors are so few that it is not worth while to keep it trim and tidy. Utility is the guiding principle. Ça ne vaut pas la peine ("It is not worth the trouble") is a final argument, and settles any doubt. That almost always means "There is no money in it."

That principle runs through matters great as well as matters small. It prevents the French from being good colonists. They colonise for what they can get out of the territories which they exploit. It gives them no pleasure to break new ground and to make the wilderness blossom like a rose. Their interest in their dependencies is purely material.

Trade between the French colonies and France is insignificant, approximately

SABOT MAKING IN RURAL SURROUNDINGS

The making of wooden shoes, an important industry in the French departments of Aisne, Aube, Maine-et-Loire, and Vosges, is being carried on in this corner of rural Brittany in simple but pleasant conditions. These wooden shoes, worn by large classes of the French peasantry, are carved in a single piece, but vary in shape according to local custom only a sixth of the colonial trade of Great Britain and only 10 per cent. of the total trade of France. The chief reason for this is that the number of settlers remains very small. Frenchmen do not like leaving France. There is no steady pressure of over-population to drive them forth to seek their fortunes. Those who do emigrate are hampered by bureaucratic red tape. They are looked down upon by the officers as pékins, an untranslatable term of disdain for civilians. The officials show, as a rule, no interest in stimulating commerce. Any question of importance has to be referred to Paris for decision.

Photo, Underwood Press Service

Thus it is not difficult for anyone who knows what life in a French colony is like to understand why the efforts made to induce young Frenchmen to emigrate have failed. The government at one period offered to let them off a

GOODLY ARRAY OF WOODEN SHOON IN A BRETON MARKET PLACE

Open-air markets are a feature of every Breton town. To them flock farmers from the countryside and merchants' wives belonging to the locality. Goods are displayed on barrows, in baskets, or more often, as in the case of the wares of the sabot-seller in the photograph, on the ground. In the rough workaday life, sabots are the universal wear, and are sometimes seen stuffed with hay or straw. The clatter of feet so shod over the stone paving provides an incessant accompaniment to the voices engaged in bargaining or gossip in every market place

Photo, Miss V. Onslow

OPEN-AIR OVEN USED IN BRITTANY FOR THE BAKING OF THE FLAT CAKES KNOWN AS GALETTES

Notable among the somewhat primitive devices in use in Breton villages is the open-air oven of stone, banked up with turf. In this are baked, among other articles of food, the coarse black pancakes of buckwheat known as galettes. In the photograph the baker is about to draw a batch of these for his two girl customers. The cart is designed to carry the large barrels in which cider, the staple drink of the country, is conveyed from the cider press to the consumer. Cider restaurants are numerous all over Brittany, a fact for which the doubtful water supply is largely responsible

GIFT OF THE SEA FOR THE FERTILISATION OF THE LAND

In Brittany many of the farms stretch down to the edge of the sea, and the seaweed left by the tides is utilised by the frugal farmers for the enrichment of their holdings. The heavily laden wagon seen in the photograph is being drawn by horses and bullocks over the rough shingle of the beach to the land on which it will be used as a fertiliser

VARIED TOIL IN PROGRESS ON A BRETON FARM

To a foreigner the Breton farmyards appear extremely picturesque, though a farmer trained in modern methods would find much to criticise in respect of their cleanliness. Granite is the main material used in the buildings. Here a felt-hatted peasant is drawing water for the laundry operations of the farmer's wife, who is tidy industry incarnate in her neat coif and full white sleeves

IN A POTATO FIELD OF THE CÔTES DU NORD

The photographer has here caught a rural scene which, while it is in the Côtes du Nord, as the north-western section of Brittany is called, has much of the atmosphere of the pleasant countryside near Barbizon, where J. F. Millet painted his famous picture "The Angelus." Next to the fisheries, agriculture provides the peasants of Brittany with their most important means of livelihood.

BRETON COUPLE IN PICTURESQUE BRIDAL ARRAY

They have been to the mairie for the civil ceremony, and are about to go on to the church for the religious service. The bridegroom has the air of a bold cavalier, the bride's dress is enriched with beautiful lace, the best man wears his best attire, and even the horse looks gay with its tasselled harness. The first step towards marriage often takes place at a Pardon.

Photos, Cr  t  

FRANCE & THE FRENCH

year of their military service if they would go abroad and stay there from nineteen to thirty. But they would not go. The best part of the trade in the French colonies is, therefore, in the hands of foreigners. There were in Algeria, a few years ago, 250,000 whites not French, and only 300,000 from France, this total including the officials and soldiers. And Algeria is the favourite colony. It is reckoned almost part of France. It is rich and full of opportunities for development. With the Sahara desert there is nothing to be done. The West Africa climate frightens away all but the unusually hardy or the "bad lots." Madagascar is not a great deal better. But in the north of Africa and in Indo-China the French had fine fields to till, and they have reaped next to no harvest. They are not a colonising race, and why should they be, so long as they can make a living in their own pleasant land? There is plenty of room for them. Here we come to a matter which we are bound to consider soon or late. Why is there plenty of room for all Frenchmen in France and not enough room for all Britons in the British Isles? The answer is because the population of the British Isles has increased rapidly, while the population of France grew slowly all through last century, and during the last fifty years or so has scarcely increased at all. There were thirty-eight million people in France in 1866. There are fewer than forty million now. Between 1866 and the present time the population of the British Isles has grown from thirty million to forty-seven million.

There need be no surprise at the tendency of the French population to remain stationary. The more civilized a nation becomes the fewer are the number of births. Comfort is valued more and more highly. Quality rather

HARVEST TIME IN BRITTANY: HOW THE PEASANTS SIFT GRAIN

Everybody works in Brittany, and the women's share in the farm labour is by no means limited to the milking and the butter-making for which the province is so famous. This photograph shows all hands engaged in sifting grain, the women feeding the cylinder sifter, from which the old man clears the straw while the younger one rakes up the grain

IN AFTER DAYS: BRETON COUPLE OFF TO MARKET

This photograph suggests a kind of happy sequel to that of the bridal couple given on page 2185. In the earlier photograph serious life was beginning. Here, we may suppose, years have passed and left their usual legacies, but the pair are still lovers, and, but that his dress is different, the "best man" may still be with them than quantity is the ideal aimed at. That this ideal is reached we cannot say for certain. The subject has not yet been studied with sufficient care or for a sufficiently long time. It is true the French are the most intelligent people in Europe, but this may not be due to the keeping down of the population. Education has much to do with it. The sentiment of equality cannot be left out of the account.

All we can say for certain is that large families are very rare in France and childless marriages numerous. Fifty-five out of every hundred married couples have only one child. Seventeen out of every hundred have no children at all. Half of the whole number of families in France consist of not more than two children. The causes of this low birth rate are partly natural and partly voluntary. The law of inheritance which provides for the breaking up of properties in equal shares makes parents disinclined towards large families. They are afraid that there might be too little to go round, and that their children might be left to depend entirely upon their own exertions and resources. Among the English this is, or used to be, thought a good way of beginning life, but the French father and mother seldom take that view. They are not happy unless they can feel that their sons and daughters will be secure. Security is one of the Frenchman's gods. This worship accounts for the anxiety of so many parents to procure for their sons a safe place in some government or municipal office. Officials, they feel, are secure.

The law of inheritance is but one of many French laws which restrict the freedom of the individual in the interest of the State. It does not permit a father or a mother to "cut off with a shilling" any member of a family. It insists that the family shall be entitled to a reasonable share of the parents' possessions. If there is one child, the parent must leave to it half of his goods. The other half he can dispose of as he pleases. If there are two children, the property is divided into three parts, only one of which is at the parent's disposal; and so on. Marriage cannot be contracted, according to French law, unless documents are produced proving the age of the parties and the consent or refusal of the parents. If consent has been formally refused it may be dispensed with, but no marriage is supposed to be permitted without the knowledge of parents.

QUESTION AND ANSWER

Of these two Breton market women one, with hands on hips, is asking a question that her companion is thinking over before giving her reply. The general neatness of their dress is an ever-pleasing characteristic of the Breton womenfolk

Photo, Miss V. Onslow

Here is another interesting and just enactment. Not only are parents held responsible for sheltering, feeding, and clothing their children. The children are also bound to support their parents when these can no longer support themselves. Even a widowed mother-in-law must be taken care of. Until recent years the position of women in France was, according to law, that of minors incapable of looking after their own property or of discharging even elementary duties of citizenship. Only since 1886 has it been possible for a wife to make provision for her old age without the consent of her husband. Only since 1895 have married women been entitled to open a separate savings bank account and to take out money when they please. Not till 1897 was it legal for a Frenchwoman to witness a deed.

Yet these disabilities before the law did not hinder the influence of women in France from being stronger and more pervading than it is, or ever was, in England. Not only social influence, but power in every kind of small business, and sometimes in public affairs as well. French men are more dependent upon women for companionship and counsel than English men. They have never taken to club life after the English pattern. The one club in Paris which has been really a success is the Jockey Club, "Le Jockey," to which women are admitted. The idea of clubs as refuges from the society of women, which is the idea most widely entertained of them in England, is repugnant to the French mind.

French wives know very often all about their husbands' affairs. They are accustomed to discuss together every sort of topic, from the news of the day in the newspapers to the best methods of managing their children. Everything is discussed frankly, without any assumption of superiority by the man or

IN THE EVENING OF HIS DAYS

Aged but active, and spruce in dress, he belongs to Plougastel, a bit of Brittany between the mouths of the Elorn and the Faou. Here the people cling tenaciously to old-time customs and costumes, seen to advantage on fête days or during Epiphany week, which is the marriage season in this part of the department of Finistère any avoidance of "indelicate" themes by the woman. Thus a French woman is in general more intelligent, more interested in the large as well as the small aspects of existence, better able to express herself upon them, than an English woman. She has one great advantage. Until she is married, or has passed the age at which marriage may reasonably be expected—say, the age of twenty-seven or twenty-eight—a French girl's reading is very carefully circumscribed. She is not allowed to read romances of the type which inflame the girlish mind with exaggerated expectations. She does not look at life through sentimental spectacles. She takes a far less ecstatic view of love and marriage than her sister in England. The stories which she is allowed to read do not suggest to her unfolding imagination that there are heights and depths of passion to be scaled and plumbed. They do not fill her soul with yearnings impossible to satisfy.

Photo, Crété

FRANCE & THE FRENCH

Thus she seldom questions the choice of a husband made for her by her parents. If she dislikes the man suggested, she can tell her father or her mother how she feels, and only in exceptional cases will any pressure be put upon her. Marriage is to the French girl less of an excitement, but more of a welcome emancipation and an entrance into life than it is to the English young woman. It is the event for which her upbringing at home and her education at school have prepared her. If she has been at a convent school, the nuns may have taught her little enough, but that little is pretty sure to have included some useful instruction in the art and science of household management. This was not always so. The convent school in the past has sometimes tended to be merely a school of elegant manners. But changes have been made even in these museums of tradition. There could hardly be one now in which the teaching of history ended at the period preceding the Revolution, thus suggesting to the tender mind that France had no history since the abolition of the old regime.

For nearly forty years now there have been high schools for girls in France; many of these give an education which could scarcely be bettered. Their course

IN A POTTERY WORKS AT QUIMPER

The Breton faience, known familiarly as Quimper, and to be found all over Brittany, is made chiefly in the town after which it is named. It is a pretty ware, modelled to some extent after that of old Rouen. Quimper itself, the chief town of Finistère, is beautifully situated in a fruitful valley between the Odet and the Steir, and has a romantic history

WHERE THE WIND COMES IN FROM THE SEA

The scene is a corner of one of those farms in the "western wing" of fair France that come down to the edge of the sea from which so many of the Bretons draw their means of livelihood. The difference in the caps of the two girls exchanging confidences by the well-side indicates that they belong to different parts of the country includes elementary teaching about the structure of the body, the rules of health, and household economy. The girls are given some idea of common law as well as "moral science," which covers a rough acquaintance with the various theories about the world propounded by philosophers. Needlework, including the cutting-out of dresses, and cookery are taught in a sensible, practical way. This sound education costs from £8 to £12 a year, with an extra £6 for those pupils who do their preparation, not at home, but in school under a mistress's eye.

Importance is given to the teaching of elementary science in the girls' lycées. Chemistry, in particular the chemistry of food; physics, so far as the care of the body and the understanding of the simpler processes of life are concerned; the structure of plants and animals—these are studied and made interesting by capable young women professors. It is probable that few of the girls could pass written examinations in them after the lapse of several years; but there is much in the lessons which they never forget. Their minds are coloured by the familiarity with the facts of existence which they have gained at school. They are more competent mothers, more skilful house-keepers, more enterprising cooks by reason of their acquaintance with these facts.

FRANCE & THE FRENCH

Bicycling to Healthy Freedom

Within the last twenty years or so there has been a change in the conditions under which French girls are brought up. They are not so shielded as they were from contact with the world of grown-up men and women. If you inquire the cause of the change, you are very often told that the bicycle made a great deal of difference. It was impossible to keep under close supervision young women who took bicycle rides, and a part of this new joy was the mixed companionship which it brought into their lives. High school girls now go backwards and forwards by themselves; when they leave school they have picked up habits of freedom and independence which cannot be suppressed. No harm has come of the change, though gloomy forebodings of evil were heard from numerous old fogies when it began. The French girl keeps her virginal charm of dainty aloofness, and has gained another—the charm of being a comrade, gay, not infrequently witty in her comments upon men and things; always delightfully, without being prudishly, comme il faut.

Functions of the Family Council

The spoiled child in France is very seldom a nuisance as he or she is apt to be in England and America. The national respect for "correctness" preserves spoiled children from outrageous behaviour. Yet a good many French children are treated with excess of affection and not enough discipline. The other side of this foible, however, reveals to us a thoroughly sound and estimable care for the interests of children. I have mentioned the family council as an illustration of the firm bonds which unite French families. One of the chief duties of the council is to secure the fair and honourable treatment of the young who are left without adequate parental guardianship. Trustees are named to watch over them and to safeguard their property. The council has power even to remove a child from the care of a father who ill-treats or neglects it.

The origin of the family council is hidden by the mists of the ages. Its history can be traced no farther back than the Middle Ages. Whether it was a development from a Roman institution has not been decided. As it exists to-day it is a materialisation of the spirit of French family life, which is still influenced by the patriarchal idea, the idea of a clan living for mutual protection under the headship of a leader and settling their difficulties in conclave. A family council is summoned by the legal official known as the juge de paix, which is the same title as that of the English justices of the peace, but which denotes very different activities.

Peacemakers for Every District

In every district there is a juge de paix, a State official, a barrister. His duty is to settle disputes in their early and less inflamed stages, and so to save the disputants from the expense and irritation of going to law. Each party explains his case to the judge. There is no intervention of lawyers. Very often the judge can settle the quarrel at once, or can inflict a light punishment if there is shown to have been wrong done. He can only commit to prison for short terms; he can inflict fines not larger than £8. Most of the disputes which come before him are about the boundaries of small farms. A good many arise out of hasty words, known to the law as defamation of character. Many juges de paix are regarded by the inhabitants of their districts with affectionate gratitude as fountains of shrewd wisdom and kindly advice. They are poorly paid, but they discharge their duties conscientiously, and their decisions are respected.

There may be another motive for calling together a family council. When

FRANCE TO-DAY

In Normandy & Brittany

Deeply religious at heart like all their Breton sisters, the women of Pont Aven seldom fail to attend Divine Service in their church

Photo, Miss V. Onslow

This old French tar seeks the aid of a barber on the Rouen quayside before he may sally forth spick and span in search of amusement

In picturesque fashion and characteristic garb this smooth-cheeked milk-maiden goes her rounds in the vicinity of Caudebec-en-Caux

The style of dress of the Breton woman depends largely on locality. In some rural districts of Finistère is worn this attractive costume which imparts to the loveliest peasant an air of gentle dignity

Photo, Crété

Arm in arm the young men and maidens of Roscoff ceremoniously parade the streets in full dress on festive occasions, their beliefs and customs being still swayed by Breton tradition of past generations

Photo, Grégoire

The sabot-maker plies his trade with a glad heart ; he knows the clatter of wooden shoes will never be hushed on the roads of Brittany

Photo, Miss V. Onslow

While wielding the distaff this old village dame, living outside Dinan, sings in quavering voice Celtic songs of the spinning-wheel

Proudly the Breton mother views the tiny son in her arms, tenderly bound like a small chrysalis in dainty shell of human handiwork

Photo, Crète

"His only vice is drink" is said of the Breton, and it is obvious that this old fisherman is not hostile to the glass that cheers

Photo, Miss V. Onslow

Carnival time is the time for reviving old costumes, which are disappearing more slowly in Brittany than in most picturesque districts

Photo, Miss V. Onslow

Many a Breton peasant vies with his country in picturesque appearance, and his stone house might be composed of Druidical remains

Photo, Crété

Knee-deep in the sea wade the hardy fisherwomen of Berck-sur-Mer in the hunt for prawns. Happily this small shrimp-like crustacean is abundant off the coast of Picardy, where it is held in high favour

Strong and erect, silhouetted against the azure seascape, stand the figures of these Norman fishermen.
Simple prawn fishers of Dieppe, yet they bear with pride their nets—the banners of their calling

Tinning sardines all the week, this young girl of Douarnenez is barely recognizable on Sunday, so smart is she in her gay Breton dress

A stone shrine crowns this rustic spring ; in such simple ways the Breton is eager to show his gratitude to the Giver of good gifts

The salt breeze blows listy messages to these Breton crab seekers, whose lads are braving the rough winds in the deep-sea fisheries

In such surroundings, the blue sky overhead, the bay of Douarnenez in the hazy distance, neighbourly chatter and childish prattle filling the air, the Breton washwoman's life is not devoid of amenities a father has, to quote the Civil Code of French law, "very serious grounds for dissatisfaction concerning the conduct of his child," he can, if the child be under sixteen, have him put into confinement for a month at a time. "Child" here means "son." A later article of the Code lays down the father's liability for his son's food and lodging. Many fathers take advantage of this provision of French law for the reclamation of spendthrift or incorrigibly troublesome young men. In one year as many as forty-six boys, all belonging to well-to-do families, were sent to an institution called the Paternal House (Maison Paternelle), not far from Tours, an institution founded for the purpose of receiving them.

Photo, Crété

The fees here are reckoned high, but when it is considered that special tuition is included with board and lodging for £10 to £12 a month, and that each boy has an attendant to himself, one can hardly see how less could be charged. The duties of the attendants are to serve the meals of the boys placed under their care, to take exercise with them, and in general to keep an eye on them.

Paternal House for Idle Boys

Only one hour is allowed for "exercise," which is limited to walking; but, oddly enough, a second hour can be obtained by the payment of fivepence for the attendant's time. The boys are prepared for examinations, and they are made to work hard. Indeed, there is nothing for them to do but work. They do not see each other. They see nobody beyond their attendants, their teachers, the chaplain, and the director. They are not known by their names, but by numbers.

The theory of the founder of the Paternal House was that solitude induces reflection, and that it is only because they have not reflected enough that boys take to evil courses. At first the inmate is put into a small and uncomfortable cell. As soon as he begins to show that he means to work and be tractable he is given better quarters, and by way of reward for progress in his studies he is taken for excursions into the delightful

Loire country, shown the magnificent historic châteaux of Touraine. Besides the hour's walk every day there are lessons in gymnastics, fencing, swimming, and riding. When the time has come for the pupil to leave, he is asked to sign a promise that he will be idle or vicious no more. On the whole, it may be said that these promises are well kept. A Paris newspaper published some years ago letters from boys who had been in confinement addressed to the director and printed in the annual reports of the Paternal House. These were all, it should be noticed, cases of idleness, not of moral turpitude. The latter are more difficult to deal with; but so far as awakening lazy and frivolous natures to a sense of the value of instruction and the seriousness of life, the establishment near Tours has been extremely successful.

Reformation by Reflection

Now for some of the letters of these "incorrigibles." One who warned his father before he was sent that he would not open a book or take up a pen to do any work, wrote after his stay that he carried away with him the most grateful recollections. He had been taught to see that life was real, life was earnest, and he had come to understand his duties as a social being. Another boy threatened at first to kill himself if he were not allowed to go home. When he left, he wrote that he did not know how to express his sense of indebtedness for all the advantages he had gained in the course of three months. "You have made me a wholly different being," he said.

Disciplinary Detention of Incorrigibles

There is another, a much larger and a cheaper place of detention for these young men in another part of France. Here the incorrigibles are treated like the young offenders who have been ordered reformatory treatment. Only £20 a year is charged. Most of those who are sent here by parents unable to discipline them are, as at the other place, the sons of widows. Although the sanction of a judge has to be given before a boy can be locked up in this way, the system is open to abuse. It happens that boys are sent away from home because their fathers dislike them, or because they are not able to concentrate their attention. Sometimes it is the method of teaching in vogue at a school which is responsible for a boy's lack of interest in his work. The French have found a simple method of knowledge is larger. There are not the same differences, Matthew Arnold observed, between the upper class and the lower middle class as are noticeable in England. "There are the manual workers forming the basis of the social pyramid, and above them comes one immense class, which consists of men who have all had the same kind of education." That was not entirely true

FRANCE & THE FRENCH

BRETON PEASANT WOMEN'S PLEASANT SUNDAY AFTERNOON

Hard, exacting toil is their portion during six days of the week. On Sunday, after attending Mass and discharging essential household duties, a brief but much valued hour of leisure falls to their lot, and this the women in the photograph are spending in a sunny spot beside the church wall, nominally for a card game, in reality for gossip dealing with backward or indolent boys, but not always quite a fair one.

Photo, Miss V. Onslow

The teaching in French high schools for boys is on a higher level than the average of teaching in English public schools. The French boy has his mind more usefully filled with information, his imagination stirred by history, his taste formed and cultivated by his national literature. Thus the French, as a nation, are better educated than the English, their intelligence has been refined and stimulated, their stock of when it was written. Since then there have been changes both in England and in France. But it does remain true that the number of Frenchmen who are intelligent and well-informed is far larger in proportion than the number of Englishmen to whom those epithets could justly be applied.

This is due in part to the social and mental training which French boys get at home. They are invited to reason things out for themselves. They are not checked when their argumentative

IN READINESS TO TAKE HER PART IN THE VILLAGE FÊTE

Well-to-do Breton farmers and fishermen send their daughters to school at some such centre as Rennes, whence they return with ideas of dress quite distinct from those of their birthplace. Those who remain at home cling to the costumes of the country, and take great pride in wearing them on all festal occasions. Native costume varies greatly, each district having its special headdress

WHEN THE HEART IS YOUNG IN OLD-WORLD BRITTANY

On fête days and at weddings the Bretons don their brightest and most characteristic attire, and take part in one of the more interesting of the institutions of the country, the old-fashioned but wholly picturesque gavotte. The music for this is usually supplied by the ancient Armorian bagpipe or "binlou" and a flageolet, one of the musicians at intervals putting down his instrument to sing some traditional air. Though to the casual observer this gavotte seems almost a frolic or very like a country dance, every movement in it is orderly and regular, and it has been traced back to early Druidical times faculty begins to show itself, by being told that "what was good enough for their fathers should be good enough for them." Then they get in the lycées an education which aims at developing the intelligence. Even the Jesuits who carried on the fashionable Paris schools, to which many Jews and infidels of humble origin sent their sons in order to appear to be of noble ancestry—even the Jesuits set before themselves the sharpening of the intellect as the end to be attained.

Against this merit of French education had to be set until recently the absence of games and of what we call the public-school spirit. That lack has been to some measure filled up. I went two years before the war to one of the most famous lycées near Paris, and found that the system in vogue there came nearer to that of an English public school than anything which had ever obtained in France before.

The Lycée Michelet, called after the famous historian, stands on a breezy hill above Vanves and has a fine outlook over the Seine valley. I drove there with a friend who was at a French lycée twenty-five years ago. He sketched a horrid picture of his school life. No organized games, no exercise save walking out two by two, the boys too old for their years, a low moral tone, very little washing, very little fresh air. "I believe they have changed a bit since then," he said. He soon discovered that they had changed a great deal. The wide-open windows everywhere, in class-rooms, dormitories, dining-hall, surprised him. The big and well-equipped gymnasium made him open his eyes still wider. At the football field and the swimming-pool he fairly gasped. At the boys whom he met he looked with puzzled curiosity.

BRETON PIPER PLAYING A SOLO

Despite their racial affinity, the Bretons have not nearly so much musical genius as the Irish, Welsh, or Cornish people. Their music is not of good quality, and their folk melodies are poor. Their musical development may, perhaps, have been retarded by the limitations of their chief instrument, the binioù

Photo, Crété

"They have changed, too," he murmured. "They look more English than French." They had square shoulders and fresh-coloured cheeks. They walked with an athletic swing. "They used to be pale-faced and long-haired," my friend said. "They used to have love affairs which they took very seriously, and they wrote poetry, modelled on Alfred de Musset. You can't imagine these boys doing anything so unwholesome."

In the "gym" there was a boy doing a muscle-grind on the horizontal bar.

BRETON PEASANT WOMEN DRESSED IN THEIR SUNDAY BEST

Already painters and poets are deploring the tendency of the gorgeous costumes of old Brittany to disappear. It is at the Pardons, themselves probably doomed to disappear, that they are chiefly seen, and in everyday life the Bretons are conforming more and more to the conventional dress of the twentieth century. The distinctive band-like collars still remain, however, and the snowy coifs, close-fitting or white-winged

Another was going through Swedish exercises with resolute thoroughness. Away in a corner on a mattress two more were boxing. They went at it in perfect good-humour, but they meant hitting, and hitting hard. One was smaller and took a great deal of punishment. No British boy could have taken it better or made a pluckier stand against odds. After this I began to understand better a statement I had read in a French review by a writer of discernment: "The young Frenchman of to-day is not particularly poetical or artistic, but he is full of courage, energy, and life."

The fees at the Lycée Michelet ranged from £40 to £70 a year for boarders, according to a boy's age. Day boys paid from £10 in the elementary division to £20 in the higher classes. Board and lodging, therefore,

GATHERERS OF MUSSELS IN QUIANT CONCARNEAU

A fishing port and sardine-tinning centre, Concarneau is much frequented by artists, who find numerous subjects among the women, who are famed for their good looks and pretty local costumes, and in the picturesque Old Town, of which a photograph is given on the next page. The baggy bloomers worn by the man are an item of masculine dress that survives modern sartorial changes cost less than £50 a year for the older boys. Set this against the fees, £120 to £150, charged at English public schools!

Many Frenchmen, admirers of British institutions, would be glad to see the French universities more like Oxford and Cambridge, just as the Lycée Michelet has been transformed into some likeness of an English public school. The French universities are what their founders, away back in the past, intended them to be—seats of learning. Oxford and Cambridge have wandered far from that intention. They have become efficient and smooth-working machines for turning out members of a governing class. They keep up the traditions of that class. They lend a pleasant unity to its life. They preserved, until lately, a bond of fellowship among those who took part in public affairs, which softened party conflict and banished rancour from politics. In France there is nothing of this kind. Young men are not sent to universities for the purpose of gaining social distinction, but because they have a thirst for learning, or because they wish to fit themselves by study for the higher intellectual activities.

FRANCE & THE FRENCH

The young Frenchman who goes to the university goes there to work, not to "have a good time." There is none of the communal life which moulds nearly all English undergraduates into a fixed type. The French student lives where he likes. He need see nothing of his fellow-students except when he is attending his classes. There are no sports to fill his leisure and to assist that balance between mental and bodily exercise which alone can produce a fully-developed man. The professors have no interest in the students save as students. In short, while the English university aims at influencing character rather than intellect, the French university considers intellect alone. Further, it must be said that the intellectual equipment which it furnishes is limited in its scope. The absence of fellowship in the pursuit of culture tends to narrow ideals, inclines the student to seek learning for its own sake, and not for its value in making him a more complete man; deprives him of the stimulus of the clash of minds, all eager, not merely to acquire knowledge, but to apply it to the solving of those problems which have troubled man's heart and intellect since the world began.

It is largely to the character of French university education that we must attribute the want of breadth which is often noticeable in French judgements, that almost inhuman insistence upon logic, and that lack of geniality in dealing with human problems, which have prevented the French from ruling with acceptance

IN AN OLD WORLD CORNER OF FINISTÈRE

The sailor and his companion and the three girls in this photograph are passing along one of the narrow and picturesque streets of the Ville Close, or Old Town, of Concarneau, which, situated on an islet some fourteen miles south-east of Quimper, presents features resembling those of St. Malo, parts of its old bastioned walls dating from the fourteenth century

Photo, Miss V. Onslow

OLD FASHIONS JOSTLE NEW IN UNPROGRESSIVE BRITTANY

Broad-brimmed hats with embroidered ribbons form the special headdress of Breton men, who also often wear striped trousers with a red sash round the waist. Loose blouses complete an attire sufficiently grotesque to eyes unfamiliar with it, and obviously designed by men long dead who never dreamed of such things as bicycles, entailing knickerbockers, Norfolk jackets, and cloth caps over what we call inferior races, and have obscured among those who have been in closest contact with them their many excellent and delightful traits.

Photo, Miss V. Onslow

The schooling of the peasant and artisan is on simple but sound lines, and results in a population well-mannered, speaking the language with fair correctness and often with vigorous charm, receptive in mind, and open to the influence of beauty in nature and in art. The école communale is, indeed, in many districts so good that parents who could afford to send their children to lycées take advantage of the école communale for at any rate some years. Every child must go to school until thirteen years old, and the advantages of education are valued by French fathers and mothers. The country schoolmaster is held in honour, and it is a fairly common

NOT AFRAID TO BLOW HIS OWN TRUMPET AS HE HAWKS HIS VEGETABLES IN THE VILLAGE STREET

Down the narrow street of the little French village comes the vegetable merchant. His equipage consists of a long, low cart drawn on its rounds by two donkeys. The small boy mounted on one of the team thoroughly enjoys his work of managing the donkeys, what time his father is engaged in bargaining with the housewife over the price of his cabbages. A believer in advertisement, he sounds his bugle to notify prospective customers of his approach. The vegetables are grown on his own land, and the thrifty housewife knows that what she buys from him will be fresh and the price not exorbitant practice for parents to send him little presents in gratitude for his pains. His position has changed very fortunately since the days of French kings, even since the reign of the Emperor Napoleon III.

Photo, Donald McLeish

Under the Bourbons there was no provision of teaching for the children of the poor. Some "schoolmasters" were at the same time gravediggers and bell-ringers in the village church. Others went about from place to place like tramps, and gave lessons in return for meals and rough lodging. In one parish the schoolmaster was also the barber. The Revolution gave birth to a scheme of village schools, but it remained, for lack of the money to carry it into effect, a scheme on paper. Napoleon thought little of education. Like all who believe that the many ought to be governed by the few, he held that the less the many knew the better. His nephew was also of this opinion. It was not until the Third Republic had got itself firmly established that France received the benefit of a good educational system.

In every commune numbering more than six thousand inhabitants there is an upper communal school as well as the elementary departments. These upper schools make special provision of teaching likely to be useful to boys who are going to be farmers or clerks or skilled workers with their hands. Thus from the lowest to the highest rungs of the ladder of education the State either provides or supervises, and the result is a compact and complete system, by no means flawless, but suited to the desires of the people, and resulting in a population better

BELLES OF QUIMPERLÉ

One of the most picturesque towns of lower Brittany, Quimperlé is famous for the personal charm and extraordinary capacity for work of its womenfolk, who customarily look as bright and neat in their everyday dress as in the holiday costumes seen here educated, taking it all round, than any other in the world.

Even after the Third Republic came into being the village schoolmaster had a hard time. The struggle between Clericalism and those who strove to keep down the influence of the Roman Catholic clergy led, as it still leads here and there to-day, to bitter animosity and persecution. Under the presidency of Marshal MacMahon, whose narrow soldier's mind was further cramped and distorted by bigoted ecclesiasticism, the party which held that the clergy ought to rule the country was in possession of far-reaching power. The schoolmaster, like all other servants of the Republic, was made by them an object of attack. They wanted to get

DUMB YOKE-FELLOWS WHO PULL TOGETHER

Dogs in France are not bred solely as pets, for the thrifty country folk find a better use for them. It is not unusual to see sturdy dogs of the type shown in the above photograph pulling along small carts through the streets, or working side by side with their master's patient donkey. Faithful and intelligent, they serve as a guard when their master is absent

Photo, Donald McLeish

FRANCE & THE FRENCH

all education into the hands of priests. Miss Betham-Edwards, who knew France intimately for a great many years, wrote at that period: "There is no one more liable to censure than the schoolmaster, and to political and social persecution. If not born a trimmer, able to please everybody, he pleases nobody, and has a hard time of it."

This form of odium theologicum has happily almost vanished. Priest and schoolmaster are generally good friends and allies. Any persecution there is nowadays comes from the triumphant anti-Clericals. They sometimes abuse their victory by doing their best to keep out of any public offices men who are known to go to church. This is only tit-for-tat, but it is unfortunate, nevertheless, and leads to injustice, since there are many who remain faithful sons of the Church without wishing to see the clergy exert any power in affairs of State. But so strong has been the feeling of anger provoked by the attempts of the priesthood to aid the restoration of the old monarchical rule in France, and so ever-present is the fear that they might succeed in deluding the people once more and crushing the freedom of life and thought which the Republic introduced, that it is still felt to be dangerous to allow Catholics to take any share in public business. This feeling, however, has been weakened by the associations brought about during the Great War.

It was after the realization of the part which the Church had taken in the "Affaire Dreyfus" that the determination grew to close its connexion with the State and to break for ever its power to interfere in the shaping of the nation's destinies. The first step was the passing of a law which called upon religious orders to register their rules and give account of their receipts and expenditure. There were 21,000 institutions which came under this law. Many of them were doing good. Many could not be shown to do harm. The argument urged in favour of the registration was that only those institutions which were using their wealth and influence against the Republic could have any reason for objecting to submit their balance-sheets. However, Rome decided to fight. Only about four hundred religious associations obeyed the law. Then the law was enforced. The penalty for refusing to register was exile and loss of property. The disobedient religious orders and societies which had chosen to obey the instructions from Rome rather than the law of their country were broken up.

NEARING HER JOURNEY'S END

Rosary in hand this Breton woman passes her old age in placid rest and contentment. Like others of her people, she is deeply religious, and finds much spiritual comfort in telling her beads, which never leave her

Photo, Miss V. Onslow

Large numbers of their members left France.

Now the clergy began agitation. There were riots. Disturbances of order became too serious to be overlooked. The Government resolved to disestablish the Church. This meant the withdrawal of the sum of nearly two millions sterling a year which the State paid in salaries of ecclesiastics, and in pensions to them when they retired. Pensions were offered, however, to priests over forty-five in age with not less than twenty years' service. Others could have had

ATTRACTIVE YOUNG WOMEN OF HUELGOAT, FINISTÈRE

Modest self-possession distinguishes the young women of Brittany, who also are of a very pleasing physical type. They are almost invariably well and suitably dressed in stout black or blue gowns with a full apron worn in front, and good shoes and stockings. All wear snow-white collars and caps or coifs, these varying in shape in different districts, and even in different villages

Photo, Cr  le

INDUSTRIOUS FINGERS THAT CANNOT BEAR TO BE IDLE

Hand-spinning is still practised in Brittany, and the Breton women pride themselves justifiably on their linen. Homespun and washed with jealous care it lasts a long time, and many of the cottagers accumulate a large quantity. In their quaint caps and serviceable dress of honest cloth the women with their distaffs make a picture of old-world feminine thrift and industry

Photo, Miss Penrice

CELEBRATION OF THE FESTIVAL OF THE BLESSED VIRGIN MARY BY THE FISHERFOLK OF BOULOGNE

Throughout Christendom the festival of the Virgin is observed with much ecclesiastical ceremony. In Boulogne it is the occasion of a great religious demonstration by the fisherfolk. The streets are lavishly decorated with flags and festoons of fishing-nets adorned with floral designs. Notable among the decorations here is an archway composed entirely of fishing implements, with a tableau setting of the Blessed Virgin Mary. The procession includes a number of fishermen's wives clad in the old-time costume of exquisite shawls, full skirts, and close-fitting white linen bonnets payments from the State for several years while they were making arrangements to be paid by their congregations. Parishes were to be managed, according to the Government proposal, by an association of seven persons, one of them being the priest. The churches would have been assigned to them for an indefinite period; for the priests' provocation. It was the Agadir incident which caused the change in the French temper. There had been shakings of the German mailed fist in 1905 and in 1908. The Emperor William had paid his minatory visit to Morocco. The German Government had demanded the dismissal of the French Foreign Minister, M. Delcassé. Then in 1911 came the

FRANCE & THE FRENCH

SURPLICED SINGING BOYS RAISE HYMNS IN THE VIRGIN'S PRAISE

Many Roman Catholics travel from England and elsewhere to witness this annual procession in Boulogne in honour of the Virgin. The church of Notre Dame stands in the old upper town, where also is the fishermen's quarter, and the choir-boys shown here participating in the ceremony, and bearing a shrine containing a representation of the Virgin, are all the sons of fishermen residences a small rent would have been paid. But the Vatican refused to make any arrangement with the French Government. For a time the feeling on both sides was venomous, but it had calmed down even before the Great War. Foolish speeches were made. These, however, were forgotten, or remembered merely with a smile.

The spell of the Tolstoyan ideas of the brotherhood of all men, irrespective of race or nationality, and of the barbarism of war, which had been common among the French conscripts not many years before, was broken by German despatch of the German gunboat Panther to Agadir, and a further effort to secure a German footing in Morocco—a country over which France considered herself to possess prior rights. Then, in the words of a writer of that day, "there was revealed to France her new soul. The mind of her young men was clearly shown."

From that moment began the hardening of the French character, which came to its full development during the long and bloody battles for Verdun in 1915. There was no desire for war in the heart of the nation. The memory of

PROTECTION AGAINST SPLASHING

This bearded water-carrier keeps his buckets from bumping up against his legs by a simple but effective device. An iron hoop rests on the top of the buckets against the handles, preserving the equilibrium while keeping them clear of the body

1870 was too painful. The incitements of the Royalists would have had no effect whatever had it not been that the people's patience was exhausted. No one doubted the object of these incitements. It was to prepare the way for a return of monarchy. It was only because they fitted the mood of the nation that they had any significance. A staff officer told me in 1913 that he had lately been in command of a regiment of Cuirassiers in a garrison town near the frontier, and that whenever "the coming war" was discussed, the men always spoke of it in this fashion: "Well, the sooner the better. Let us stop their pin-pricks once and for all." What struck this officer even more than their words was their physical attitude. "Their eyes grew brighter and harder. Instinctively their thighs gripped the saddles more firmly, their fingers resolutely gathered up the reins. They were ready for a forward move."

Surprise was expressed by many in England at the hardihood in adversity which the French displayed during the war. They were said to have been changed by it. Nothing of the kind happened. War only brought out their characteristics more clearly. It merely intensified the good qualities—and the defects also—which distinguished them before.

The notion that the French would be unable to endure the nerve-strain of a long war, the fear that they would crumble under defeat, were in the minds of none who knew them. The more fortune turns against them, the harder do the French become. There is in one of Conan Doyle's stories—"The Tragedy of the Korosko"—a Frenchman who is in this respect typical of his race. A party of tourists in Egypt is captured by Dervishes. The choice is offered between conversion to Islam and immediate death. Those who are sincere Christians are ready to die for their faith. But the Frenchman is not a Christian. He has no religious belief. To him Allah and Jehovah are the same. Why should he refuse to acknowledge the Moslem god? One expects to hear him say cynically that he is prepared to embrace any faith that will save his life. What happens is that he declares himself at once to be

MAIDENS PAY THEIR TRIBUTE TO THE VIRGIN MOTHER

Naturally, the festival makes a great appeal to the imagination and devotional instinct of the little ones, and many children take part in the procession. This photograph shows a section occupied by young girls, two pretty children, with flowing locks and filleted brows, coming first carrying a large crucifix, and followed by a train of older maidens all in white and wearing veils and garlands

BOULOGNE FISHWIVES SHOREWARD BOUND TO CATCH FRESH PRAWNS FOR GOURMETS' TABLES

Herrings are the fish specially associated with Boulogne, where a large export trade is done in the salted fish. Prawns are abundant among the submerged rocks in shallow water, where they feed upon the small green seaweeds, and many of the fishermen's wives go down to catch them, using traps and nets. The Boulogne fisherfolk are a distinctive class of the population of the town, where they live in a separate quarter and retain the old-time customs and costume of their forbears. Their women are of a very fine physical type

HAPPY FREEDOM IN A HARVEST FIELD OF FAIR AND FERTILE LORRAINE

Passionately French in sentiment—"more French than the French," as they themselves declare—Lorrainers deeply resented their incorporation in the German Empire in 1871 and only lived for the day, that dawned in 1919, when they should be restored to "La Patrie." Watered by the Moselle and the Saar, theirs is a beautiful and a generous land, rich in grain and vines and timber, where the peasants work industriously amid charming pastoral scenery, and happily, now that the heavy burden of Prussian domination has been removed

Photo, Donald McLeish

FRANCE & THE FRENCH

of the same mind as the Christians. The attempt to convert him by threat arouses in him not merely antagonism, but anger. He will not, even in order to save his life, profess a belief that he despises. Let them kill him. He would find all equally absurd, which makes those who judge the country from books, and who are not acquainted with all classes, fancy that France has no ideals, no settled aims or purposes.

The idea long held the British imagination captive that the French were always excited about something or other. The truth is that they are not an excitable race—indeed, they are less so than the English. French characters on the English stage up to within a few years ago were invariably represented as talking loudly, gesticulating furiously, working themselves up into a passion upon very small provocation. I have seen the French at moments which in England would have certainly been marked by excited demonstrations, comport themselves coolly, showing no feeling at all. One such moment was in 1905 when Germany insisted upon the removal of M. Delcassé from the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. There was provocation enough then, yet the French did not allow themselves to betray any resentment. If the German Government had made a like demand upon Great

IN PENSIVE MOOD

Wearing the pretty costume often seen in her native village of Les-Ponts-de-Cé, in the department of Maine-et-Loire, this naturally charming daughter of La Belle France has been caught by the camera in a somewhat meditative mood rather die than bend his will to that of savage fanatics.

There was the French character, which in the fire of crisis can be fused into unbreakable steel.

In their prosperous hours they are, as a nation, seen to least advantage. Politicians create strife over trifles. The distrust, more marked in France than elsewhere, between the "man of the people" and the bourgeois, grows more bitter. The restless minds of the "intellectuals" pass in review all systems, all philosophies, all faiths, and

Britain, and the German newspapers had been as insulting in their tone, and British interests had been threatened as French interests were in Morocco, it is certain that London and other cities would have resounded to warlike cries.

In France there was nothing of all this. There was a tense atmosphere, as that of a July day before a thunderstorm. There was much quiet discussion. But on the surface life went on as usual. It was announced that M. Delcassé would leave his post. Shoulders were shrugged. Curses were uttered in a low

ROUGH WINDING PATHS THAT TAX THE OLD AND INFIRM

The side streets and alleys of many French towns are often rough and uneven, lacking drainage and serving as a repository for household refuse and rubbish of all sorts. The wrinkled old Breton pausing to rest by a convenient window-ledge on her way to fill her bucket at a neighbouring fountain represents the dogged working qualities possessed by the labouring classes in France tone. It was announced that negotiations had come to a happy conclusion. Again there was shrugging of shoulders. The atmosphere lightened. Everybody felt relief. But there was no excitement.

Photo, Cr  t  

FRANCE & THE FRENCH

Another of the moments in which the French showed their perfect command over their feelings was that of the outbreak of the Great War. They watched the course events were taking.

I was in Nancy on the day the mobilization order was posted up. That night there were lights in the cafés and groups of reservists still drinking and talking till the small hours. There was much recollecting of old days "in the regiment." A grey-haired man carrying a sword wrapped in a newspaper was ironically cheered as he went by. A major in the reserve who made a needy

WASHING-DAY IN A FRENCH VILLAGE IN HAUTE ALSACE

All the family who are not already out at work lend a helping hand at the communal washing-place in the square of the Alsatian village now restored to France. While the elder girl is busy with soap and scrubbing-board her brother is engaged in keeping the two smaller children out of mischief

Photo, Kadel & Herbert

They did nothing to hasten or retard it. When the challenge was thrown down, they took it up gravely. There was little boasting. The processions in Paris were made up of hooligans who seized the opportunity to pillage shops. Those who spoke of the thought that was in everyone's mind said quietly: "So it has come at last. We had endured their pin-pricks long enough."

knife-grinder put an edge to his sabre was the centre of a laughing crowd. But there was no marching about or shouting. There was even less effervescence than there had been the night before, when the event hung still doubtfully in the scale. After the tension of the days past, after the reports hourly changing, inclining now to war, now to settlement, after the suspense and

REUNION: AN IDYLL OF ALSACE

The soldier son of the family seen in the photograph has returned to his native Thann from the battlefields of the Great War, and as he tells his story, with his younger sisters seated by his side, his mother pursues her task at the washing-board by the little stream as she listens to first-hand news and hides her emotion in the energy devoted to her work

Photo, Donald McLeish

OLD WORLD CHARM OF DRESS AND ARCHITECTURE IN ALSACE

Beside the stone fountain, with its curiously-devised jets, three little maids pose for the photographer in the square of the village. Their national costume, with its white blouse and apron, velvet bodice, and enormous black bow on the head, has been much more in evidence since the territory of Alsace-Lorraine has passed once more into the hands of France

COUNTRY DWELLERS KEEPING A FÊTE DAY IN A NEIGHBOURING TOWN

Fête days afford opportunities for merrymaking, of which the simple Alsatian countryfolk are not slow to avail themselves. In their best dresses they present a picture of smiling contentment as they wander round the town of Oberseebach in search of amusement and entertainment. Alsace, with its rich products of timber, grain, and wine, provides profitable employment for the peasantry

LOVE'S OLD STORY IN AN ALSATIAN SETTING

The fiancée of this young soldier is proud of her lover for the perils he has passed in helping to wrest their native province from the grip of the German mailed fist, and his pride in her is equally manifest. He is wearing the uniform of the Chasseurs Alpins, and she the costume of the women of Alsace, made specially picturesque by its large winged headdress

Photo, Donald McLeish

THREE LITTLE MAIDS OF ALSACE IN NATIONAL COSTUME

Alsations, tenaciously conservative of old tradition, preserve their beautiful folk costume unchanged. Huge winged black bows on the head are its most distinctive feature, with long, full skirts of red or green, white stockings, and black shoes. A white bodice with full sleeves is confined within elaborate velvet and embroidered corsets with shoulder-straps of lace, but these young, undeveloped girls wear pretty cross-overs instead strain, the decision seemed almost to bring relief. A few women silently wept. A few toppers clinked glasses. The rest went about the business of the hour.

Next day I travelled by motor-car to Paris. The country had been transformed as if by a miracle from peace to war. At the entrance to every town, to every village of any size, barriers had been put up. These were guarded by Territorials, and officials asked all travellers politely for their papers. The whole male population was either in uniform already, or getting into it without delay. The red trousers and the blue coats, which proved so utterly unsuitable and had to be given up as quickly as possible, were all ready to be served out. The reservists arrived at the barracks in all sorts of clothes. Some were smart young men of fashion. Some were clerks or shopmen. Many workmen wore their working blouses. Into the barracks they poured, received their uniforms, and, when they came out on to the barrack square, they all looked amazingly alike.

The Territorials, men of more than thirty-five years, were doing most of the work in these early days, and doing it with a stolid, business-like air. They patrolled the railway lines, they guarded the bridges. Middle-aged men, many

FRANCE : FAIR PATRIOT FROM ALSACE

Always intensely French, the women of Alsace and Lorraine now freely carry the tricolour cockade on the huge black bows that are the crowning feature of their beautiful costumes

To face page 2236

Photo, Cr  t  

NEAR THE BLUE ALSATIAN MOUNTAINS

These two old countrywomen of Alsace have paused awhile beside the well situated near to the plot of ground that is the scene of so much of their daily toil. The well itself is notable for the carving on one of the stout supports for the chain and bucket, and for the rim of iron on which the bucket can be rested of them fathers of families, lean mechanics, portly heads of businesses, spectacled studious teachers, and men of letters, they had left their counters and their counting-houses, their lathes, study tables, or professors' chairs, or perhaps they had just laid down scythes and mattocks. They had put on their uniforms again, submitted to the discipline of the army. They were sleeping "on the straw," dining off the "soup of the soldier," helping in their country's defence, all without any fuss or self-consciousness, without any trace of emotional disturbance.

After the Armistice had been signed on November 11, 1918, the Londoner felt he must work off his joy in shouting, in riding about on crowded taxicabs, in calling for the King and Queen to appear on the balcony at Buckingham Palace. The Parisians made no noise, waved no flags, never thought of gathering round the Elysée Palace and shouting for the President to come out. They used to write about the phlegmatic Englishman. It is the French who are really phlegmatic, who really look upon excitement as a form of mild insanity, who in crises can keep calm.

It was French vivacity, French vigour of speech, which misled English observers. Those who looked into the lives of the French were not deceived. For example,

MEMORIAL OF THE MARTIAL PROWESS OF THE "GRAND MONARQUE"

Human activity swarms through the gate of St. Denis, dividing the Rue du Faubourg St. Denis, seen in the foreground, from the Rue St. Denis, one of the oldest, and still busiest, streets in Paris. The fine arch commemorates the victories of Louis XIV. in Holland and on the Rhine, figured under the trophy-covered obelisks, the Grand Monarque himself figuring in the relief above the archway

TO THE IMMORTAL HONOUR OF EMPEROR AND "UNKNOWN WARRIOR"

Towering up from an eminence in the Place de l'Étoile, at the end of the Avenue des Champs Elysées, the superb Arc de Triomphe is a landmark all over Paris and symbolises the military glory of all France. Commemorating primarily the victories of Napoleon I., it is doubly hallowed now since France's "Unknown Warrior," killed in the Great War, was laid to rest beneath it

FLOWERS ON THE RIVER BANK PACED BY IMMORTAL LOVERS

Great variety of interest is given to a walk along the Seine where it winds through Paris by the different industries that have appropriated the successive quays. Here is given a hint of the colour and fragrance spread over the Quai aux Fleurs which runs from the Pont de Notre Dame to the Pont de St. Louis. Upon this quay once stood the abode of Abelard and Heloise

BLUE-BLOUSED RAILWAY PORTER OF BOULOGNE

One of the first types of Frenchmen seen by the cross-Channel traveller on landing, the railway porter in his workmanlike blouse, peaked cap, and muffler is a hard and—if a substantial "pourboire" is forthcoming—very willing worker none but a phlegmatic folk could endure the tyranny of the concierge. If there were attached to all blocks of flats in London a guardian of the gate who systematically blackmailed all the tenants, there would be such excitement as would result in their being violently swept away. In Paris, shoulders are shrugged whenever the concierge is mentioned. "What will you? Of course we are robbed. But what can we do? Nothing, absolutely nothing."

Photo, Horace W. Nicholls

Not all concierges are robbers. Many are the firm and faithful friends of the dwellers in appartements. Many discharge their duties with conscience and competence, and do many a kind little service besides. But in general they have a bad name, and it is not, I fear, undeserved. This is partly the fault of the system. Imagine the power which can be exercised by a malevolent being who knows all your comings out and your goings in, who knows what you have for dinner and where you send your washing and why you sometimes have a headache "the morning after"; who looks at all your letters and reads all your postcards; who keeps note of your visitors and pumps your servant for any information which he, or she—very often she—cannot get for him or herself.

It is so easy to offend your concierge. You may do it by coming in late and ringing for the cord to be pulled which opens the street door. The Paris flats are built usually round a courtyard, which has gates on the street. These are closed at a certain hour. The concierge sleeps with a cord close to the bed, and when anyone rings he is supposed to pull it at once. Sometimes he requires those who pass in to shout their names as they go by his loge, the tiny habitation on the ground floor in which he and his family dwell. Or offence may be given by not paying on a scale considered sufficiently generous. There is a regular payment for the attentions of the concierge, but it is small, and has to be supplemented by tips at the New Year and at other times, and by constant small payments for services rendered. If you are set down as stingy, or if for any other reason you get a bad mark against your name, the concierge can make your life a burden to you. Visitors who inquire for you will be told that you are out when you are in, and, when you are out, that you have left for good. Parcels will be sent away or hidden, messages will be forgotten, cards left upon you will be torn up. It is one of the duties of the concierge towards the tenant to take up the letters which the postman leaves on the ground floor. These can be kept back and, if you live high up, they often are kept back simply from laziness. Thus your friends may be estranged, your tradesmen made suspicious, those who ask favours of you offended, and those from whom you have reason to expect benefits turned into enemies for life.

FRANCE & THE FRENCH

As for the scandals which the concierges are able to cause, if ill-naturedly disposed, they are a torture to the thin-skinned, and even to those who laugh at them they may be a source of irritating inconvenience, possibly of actual loss. Sensitive people have been driven to suicide by stories set going in the concierge's loge. Here the servants are often to be found gathered in the evenings, and their talk centres as a rule upon the affairs and oddities of their employers. To propitiate the concierge, who can do a servant bad turns by whispering, for instance, about the lateness of the hours she keeps, it frequently happens that a bottle of wine is taken in, or some dainty from the larder, something that the employer "will never miss." Those unfortunate tenants who have given ground for gossip and evil-speaking are blackmailed without pity, and wherever they may move to they find that their reputation has gone before them. There is a freemasonry among concierges which tangles perpetually the foot of the indiscreet.

The servants who compose the parliament of the concierge are mostly of the type known as bonnes à tout faire (maids to do everything). But

PAINTING FROM LIFE IN A PARIS ART SCHOOL

In one of the large studios of the Colarossi Academy in Paris a "life" class is at work on a model who sits on the dais on the right. Paris is a renowned centre for aspiring artists, who come from all parts of the world to study in the art schools, usually taking up their quarters in the Montmartre district in the north of the city, or in the Quartier Latin south of the Seine.

Copyrighted, 1922, by the Amalgamated Press (1922), Limited

POSTMAN OF THE REPUBLIC

The postman in France carries his letters in a long case of shiny black leather slung across his shoulders. He makes a pleasing figure as he goes his round in his uniform of blue tunic, white trousers, and stiff peaked cap

This is a practice known to all. Neither the tradesmen nor the servants' employers object to it. It is not a good plan, for a bonne who is unscrupulous will spend more than is necessary in order to increase her commission, though it must be added that the French servant can seldom be called dishonest, however keen she may be on picking up whatever unconsidered trifles may happen to come in her way. The halfpenny in the franc commission is really a tax on the employers of servants; the tradesmen take good care of that. But it is often a nuisance for the tradesman as well. He has to take pains not to offend the bonne. He must sometimes flatter, sometimes bribe, in order to keep her custom. Here again is an inconvenience, to say the least of it, which the French phlegmatically suffer instead of taking steps to end it.

they are not in the least like the "maid of all work" type in England; they are more like housekeepers. For example, they are accustomed to do every day the family marketing. Off they go after breakfast with baskets on their arms, neatly dressed, often wearing a starched and frilled cap, and lay in the household stores. Even if a mistress wished to do her own shopping she would find this difficult, for not only would the tradesmen charge her more than they charge a bonne, but the bonne would have an unappeasable grievance against her mistress. For out of the shopping the bonne makes a profit which is quite a valuable addition to her wages.

On each franc that she spends she receives back a halfpenny as commission.

Perhaps, though, if you employed a bonne à tout faire you would value her good qualities so highly that this commission evil would seem by comparison trifling. For undoubtedly she has merits which more often offset it in the eyes of her employers. She is a hard worker. Early in the morning she comes down from the top floor of the apartment building, where all the servants sleep, and begins in her kitchen. By eight o'clock she has taken round the "little breakfasts" of coffee with rolls and butter, and as soon as the family is dressed she gets to work on the bedrooms, so as to have them done before she goes to market. She must be back in good time to prepare déjeuner, which is the French family's principal meal. After that has been cooked and served

HAPPY HUNTING-GROUND FOR THE LITERARY AUTOLYCUS

Many a treasure has been found by the literary Autolycus in the boxes of the dealers in second-hand books whose wares are displayed on the parapets of the Seine embankment, particularly on the south side of the river near to the Quartier Latin. Here and there among the boxes and trays of books, pictures, drawings, and curios often find a place

READY-TO-WEAR CLOTHING FOR SALE OUTSIDE A PARISIAN OUTFITTER'S

The average Parisian is far less self-conscious than the Londoner, who would probably hesitate to stand on the pavement while being fitted with a new coat. To see an outfitter helping a customer to try on a new jacket from a heap of cheap ready-made garments piled on tables outside his shop is a common experience in Paris which excites no comment from the passers-by

ENTRANCE TO THE PROMENADE OF THE "BEAU MONDE" OF PARIS

The magnificent avenue known as the Champs-Élysées is the parade-ground of fashionable Paris, whose carriages and motor-cars are continuously passing to and fro over this spacious thoroughfare. On a slight eminence stands the massive structure of the Arc de Triomphe de l'Étoile, the largest triumphal arch in existence, erected by Napoleon I. to commemorate his victories

THE "PLAYGROUND OF PRINCES AND THE BATTLE-GROUND OF KINGS"

The historic gardens of the Tuileries were first laid out in the reign of Louis XIV.; enlarged in 1889, they now cover the site of the Palace of the Tuileries, the scene of many of the most disastrous events that attended the subversion of the French monarchy. The Arc de Triomphe du Carrousel, an imitation of the Arch of Severus at Rome, was formerly the principal entrance to the Tuileries

ONE OF THE WORLD'S MOST BEAUTIFUL AND MOST TRAGIC SQUARES

Situated between the Champs-Élysées and the Jardin des Tuileries is the Place de la Concorde, a part of Paris extraordinarily rich in historical associations, and in many terrible memories connected with the Reign of Terror. A glimpse of the Madeleine is seen in the central background to the left of the ancient obelisk which once stood in front of the great Temple of Thebes in Upper Egypt

POPULAR PARIS THOROUGHFARE: BOULEVARD MONTMARTRE

Many of the fine open streets of Paris are styled "boulevards." It would be far from easy to define exactly the characteristics that distinguish the boulevard from the ordinary street, but the long rows of trees, the many newspaper kiosks, and the numerous cafés, with the host of tables and chairs outside their doors, are undoubtedly distinctive features of the typical boulevard of the present day

COLLECTING RESIN FROM THE PINE WOODS OF GIRONDE

Although the chief industry of the Gironde district of south-western France is wine-production, much work is done in the forested areas. The method adopted in collecting resin from the pine trees is somewhat similar to that in use by the rubber growers illustrated on pages 496 and 854. The white-coated workman makes incisions in the stem, and the gum runs into a metal cup

Photo, Frank C. Shaw

BASQUE GIRL VISITING A FAMOUS GROTTA NEAR HER HOME AT LOURDES

She is standing near the entrance to the famous Grotte du Loup, a large stalactite cavern near Lourdes, the centre of a yearly pilgrimage of sick and infirm who hope to be cured by drinking the water of the holy well there. Although the influence of the outside world has left its stamp on this girl's dress, the Basques are a superstitious and conservative people, never courting change for the sake of change

Photo. George Long

she has her first free time in the day. She enjoys her own déjeuner, which is, as a rule, very much the same as that of her employers. She drinks wine, and she takes her black coffee afterwards. The idea that servants could be fed on food of inferior quality has never obtained in France since the Revolution, when the theory of equality became a fixture in the national consciousness.

This affects also the relations between the bonne and her employers. She is often made a friend. Her mistress will consult her on matters of domestic economy, even of dress. She will confide to her mistress her family troubles and her love affairs. When they are annoyed, bonnes are inclined to be insolent, to tell home truths. But their stormy tempers soon quiet down and their self-possession comes back. Their self-respect is strong, and it teaches them to respect others.

Their manners are pleasant. They open the door to visitors neither with the Polar coldness of the expensive English parlourmaid nor with the frowsty familiarity of the "slavey." They have a welcoming smile for those whom they admit. They are sympathetic when there is nobody at home. If a caller were to speak to a bonne in a tone which she considered rude, if a man failed to

LINKED BY THE DANCE TO AN IMMEMORIAL PAST: BASQUE MEN REHEARSING A WAR DANCE. Cereemonial dances are a prominent feature of their social life, and include nearly every kind of dance found among primitive races. Thus there are dances in which the men represent animals, dances representing agriculture and the vintage, dances representing weaving, in which those taking part plait coloured ribbons round a pole, religious dances before the altar, and war dances, such as that illustrated here, which somewhat resembles the sword dance of the Scottish Highlanders

FRIENDLY CHAT IN THE EARLY MORNING ON THE RESPLENDENT QUAYSIDE OF VILLEFRANCHE

This important naval station in the Department of the Alpes Maritimes is situated a few miles from Nice on a sheltered bay, at the foot of richly-wooded heights. Charles of Anjou, who became King of Naples, founded the town in the thirteenth century, and for many years it was famous as the naval headquarters of the Dukes of Savoy and the Kings of Sardinia. In its immense arsenal, and in its many dockyards, much important business is transacted; but this quiet corner of the quayside, where nature seems asleep and the whole world flooded with sunshine, is an ideal spot for friends to meet and pass the time of day

Photo, Horace W. Nickells

DISTILLING LAVENDER IN THE FIELDS WHERE IT IS GROWN IN SUNNY HYÈRES

Situated in the Department of Var, on the Mediterranean, the little town of Hyères is a noted centre of floriculture, being particularly suited therefor by the equable and warm climate. In the fields the labourers are placing the cut lavender into large metal retorts placed in one corner of the ground. Fires are lighted under the stands and the distilled oils drained off. The success of the lavender harvest depends very much on the weather, for if the early summer months are unduly wet, the quantity and quality of the crop, which is harvested in August, suffer considerably.

FRANCE & THE FRENCH

raise his hat slightly to her when he asked if madame was chez elle, if she were not addressed as mademoiselle, she would take offence, and very likely show her resentment the next time the caller appeared. But so long as the bonne is treated with the respect to which every Frenchwoman deems declamation, and at the end said: "What a pleasure, mademoiselle, to hear one's language so well pronounced."

That the difference between the speech of the cultured and that of the mass is slighter in France than in most other countries is largely due to the care which is taken to make actors and actresses

GATHERING FRAGRANT VIOLETS IN A FIELD AT HYÈRES

In the sunny climate of southern France flowers abound, and a considerable trade is done in exporting blooms to England or sending them to scent factories. These workers are picking violets destined for the London market. The flowers are protected from strong winds by screens similar to the one seen behind the workers, raised a few feet from the ground herself entitled, she will be smooth, agreeable, even charming. She is a characteristic figure in French life.

Photo, Horace W. Nicholls

A writer who knows France very well (Miss Winifred Stephens) tells this story to illustrate the cultivated intelligence of the servant class. A friend who had invited her to go to the Théâtre Français—the National Theatre—was prevented from going herself, and sent her bonne to act as chaperon. This good woman had received merely an elementary school education, and Miss Stephens expected her to be bored by the performance of a classic tragedy. But she watched its development with interest, listened attentively to the speak correctly. Their drama has an influence upon the people's speech as well as upon their intelligence. It would be absurd to think that all French plays are of a nature to shock British susceptibilities. But it is true that in their farces they often overstep the limits which in England are set to propriety, and that in their serious pieces they discuss the facts of existence without any desire to conceal the uglier aspects of them.

The French do not observe the same reticence as the Anglo-Saxon race. Their comic journals are frequently coarse, frequently designed to stir the lower passions, sometimes repulsive,

BLOSSOM TIME IN THE ORANGE GROVES OF SOUTHERN FRANCE

The flowering fields of the Riviera are one of its chief delights. In the neighbourhood of Grasse some 60,000 acres are under cultivation, and heliotrope, hyacinth, tuberose, violet, rose, orange-blossom, each in its season, scents the atmosphere for several miles round. Orange trees are cultivated specially for their flowers, from the petals of which delicious essences are manufactured, over two thousand tons being annually consumed for the manufacture of eau-de-Cologne

There were papers in Paris which during the South African War filled every Briton with disgust, whatever his opinion of the war might be. This is a side of French character which it is impossible to ignore. Nor is it possible to overlook the ravages of another evil—alcoholism. Here we have to distinguish between drunkenness in its ordinary disgusting form and the gradual poisoning of the mind and body, which is caused by drinking to excess such spirits as absinthe and vermouth (there is another kind of vermouth besides the French; this is the Italian, which is harmless). Against drunkenness there is a strong prejudice in France. It is looked upon as degrading, as a hateful vice. The habitual drunkard is treated as one who forfeits all rights of citizenship. After a certain number of convictions he can be disqualified from serving on juries or holding any public office. He may even be deprived of his vote.

Rarely does one see a drunken man in France. Women are scarcely ever known to drink too much. In the cafés, to which most people resort, no hard or steady drinking goes on. Indeed, the sale of coffee and sirops and other non-intoxicants used to be larger in most cafés than the sale of alcoholic liquors. Yet in recent years there has been a disastrous growth of the disease known as alcoholism. Fifty-six million pounds a year the nation was spending before the Great War on alcohol in its most dangerous forms. During the war the sale of absinthe was forbidden, and there has arisen a cry for its perpetual prohibition. For alcoholism is one of the causes of the alarming increase of tuberculosis, which in the nineteenth century carried off ten millions of people, and in France alone, during this century, has been killing a hundred thousand every year. Vigorous efforts are being made to reduce this number. Teaching is given everywhere as to the precautions to be taken against the disease. Open-air hospitals for consumptives have been provided, and a number of agricultural colonies for tuberculous soldiers are in operation.

FRANCE & THE FRENCH

It will, however, take some time for the people to be persuaded of the value of these measures, for although they are Republicans, the French are conservative in their habits of thought. They do not like changes. They clung, for example, to the red trousers of their soldiers' uniform when other nations adopted colours that would not attract attention. Only after numberless soldiers had been sacrificed because they were too conspicuous did the French nation admit the desirability of altering the old uniform and adopting the "invisible blue."

There was dogged opposition also to the income tax, originally proposed by M. Caillaux. It was only imposed under stress of war necessity. Men of all parties call for administrative reforms which shall reduce the over-centralisation from which the country suffers.

In all that has to do with the Army the disinclination to make changes comes out especially strong. This is due, not only to the fact that among French officers patriotism amounts to a religion, and that any tampering with the chief instrument of patriotism arouses suspicion and jealousy; it is in part accounted for by the hardened officialism of the War Office, which

ONE OF THE WILLING WORKERS IN A CHAMPAGNE VINEYARD

The chubby hands of this tiny French demoiselle pull aside the long tendrils, disclosing cluster after cluster of the luscious fruit, and her basket is soon full to overflowing. The grape-gathering season is of but short duration, and before long the vintagers will turn their backs on the despoiled vineyards with the proverbial sigh of relief—perhaps of regret: "Adieu paniers! Vendanges sont faites." ("Farewell, baskets! The vintage is over.")

CATTLE FROM THE LOWER PYRENEES ON SALE IN THE MARKET PLACE OF HISTORIC ORTHEZ

On market days the old town of Orthez, in the Basses-Pyrenees, the scene of Wellington's victories in the Peninsular War, is thronged with country folk. They come down from the hills with their cattle, which, although not equal to the stock produced in Normandy or in maritime Flanders, yet bring the owners enough return to justify the weekly journey down to the town standing on the Gave de Pau. All the men who throng the market place are wearing the short, loose blouses and the soft, blue bounnets of the mountain people of France.

STURDY DEFENDERS OF FRANCE'S MOUNTAIN FRONTIERS

The Chasseurs Alpins are among France's finest light troops. Employed chiefly for mountain work, they are distributed among the higher military formations. Apart from the usual military equipment, these troops, who wear a special dark-blue uniform, carry ice-axe, alpenstock, ropes, and all the usual implements of the mountaineer, the complete weight per man amounting to over 60 lb.

Photo, Donald McLeish

opposes a solid rampart of inertia whenever reform is proposed. Thus the French mobilisation plans were known for many years to be obsolete. Military authorities, one after the other, urged that precautions should be taken against a German advance through Belgium. When war came there was none. The mobilisation trains carried the troops to the Eastern frontier, where the Chinese wall of fortifications had long been recognized by the Germans as an obstacle too formidable to pass in the first days of a campaign. The same opposition to improvement in the War Office sent the French Army Medical Service to the front with horse-drawn store-carts and far too few ambulances. I recollect a priest who had been called up and put in charge of the drugs and dressings with a field service hospital telling me in those early days, "For many years motor vans for this purpose have been talked about, but you see we did not get beyond that." As a class, French officers are

WINTER SNOWS BRAVED IN THE WINTER OF LIFE

Nowhere are to be found more hard-working people than the French peasants. Of an age when many would consider themselves past work, this cheerful old dame still braves the winter snows in Upper Savoy to collect sticks in the woods intelligent and hard-working. They enter the Army as men go into medicine or the law—in order to make a living and, if possible, to win distinction as well. They study their profession even more devotedly than the usual run of lawyers and doctors. There are, of course, men among them who have no ambition to be more than competent regimental officers, but as a rule one finds French lieutenants and captains sensible and industrious, French majors and colonels wise and experienced men of the world in addition to being capable commanders and administrators, and French generals able and ready to discuss both matters relating to their profession and the general affairs of the universe with shrewdness and wit. Whatever their rank, French officers are almost always courteous, hospitable, simple and charming in their manners, pleasant companions, and, although insistent upon strict discipline, for the most part kindly and friendly with their men.

Photo, Horace W. Nicholls

The private soldiers are all conscripts who serve their two or three years (the term was lengthened, as will doubtless be remembered, a short time before the war), and then become reservists, compelled to go through a certain amount of training for so many years until they are drafted into the Territorial Army. Whether on balance military service does more good than harm is an open question. Most educated Frenchmen, if they deal with one frankly, confess that their time in the ranks was worse than distasteful, and left them very few memories which they could recall with any pleasure. The one advantage that is generally admitted is the mixture of men belonging to all the social strata. They learn to know one another. They come to understand that human beings cannot be judged in classes, but must be weighed as individuals, there being just the same varied types in one class as in another. The rich man's son discovers that the comrade with whom he has most in common is a bricklayer or a ploughboy. The conscript from the slums finds that the bourgeois is as ready to do him a service or to exchange a cheery word as any of his own comrades. All are of the North & South

FRENCH FOLK

Wrinkled and toothless, this old lady, in her trim cap and closely-buttoned embroidered tunic, personifies the ancient peasantry of France

Photo, Miss V. Onslow

With her hooked nose and chin, and distaff and spindle, this old Auvergnat is like the witch of the fairy tales outside the magic castle

Her exquisite shawl is the pride of this peasant of Auvergne, whose strong dignity accords well with that of the weathered stone about her

An aged native of the Bourbonnais, she totters on her stick to bask in the sunshine and hug the warmth of her long blanket-like cloak

Like the old lady opposite, this peasant is a Bourbonnaise. Her hat is the local fashion, and she shows a certain coquetry in her sabots

Though listeners may hear no good of themselves, they can derive entertainment from eavesdropping round the fountain of Villefranche

Photo, Horace W. Nicholls

House-mates and friends. In Puget-Théniers the people commonly give their ground-floor rooms to their donkeys, living upstairs-themselves

Photo, Horace W. Nicholls

A mild flirtation with a pretty girl by a fountain of Puget-Théniers amuses the merry vender of brooms and turnips in his leisure moments

Photo, Horace W. Nicholls

In the summer sunshine of Southern France the brimming fountain in the square of Puget-Théniers is a welcome boon to thirsty man and beast

Photo, Horace W. Nicholls

Plucking oysters at Arcachon, the chief centre of oyster production in France. Spat is supplied by Government to private persons, who lease "parks," where they cultivate the oysters in cases fixed to the foreshore by stakes

Stills are indispensable in the marshy Landes, and the Landais can travel on them as fast as a horse can trot. When resting they slant the stils as if sitting down, and prop themselves up with a third pole

Skeleton wagons like this, drawn by oxen with tasselled veils, are the common transport of the peasants dwelling round about Le Mont-Dore

Ploughing with these wheelless ploughs, used in the Sapeniere valley amid the Dauphiné Alps, is back-aching work for mule and man

Photo, Donald McLeish

Here France ends and Italy begins. The triangle seen on the rock to the left of the viaduct is the frontier mark on the road

Photo, Horace W. Nicholls

Born and bred French, these young Alsatis are proud to be photographed with one of the Frenchmen who freed them from German rule

Relieved of the heavy taxation imposed on them by the Germans, the women of Alsace have more money to spend on their marketing

Wearing the trim head-dress of her people, the Savoyarde makes a pretty picture scouring her linen in a stream at the mountain foot

Photo, Donald McLeish

FRANCE & THE FRENCH

equal in the eyes of the sergeant. All have the same inconveniences, the same hardships to endure.

The young man called up at the age of twenty-one has a uniform served out to him in barracks, and is allotted his place in a big dormitory. The uniform need not be new. Often it has been worn before, and it must be looked at carefully to see that it is not stained or torn, for the new wearer will now have to pay the penalties for any slovenliness on the former wearer's part. The soldier's fare is monotonous—stewed meat and vegetables, as a rule; no wine except on manoeuvres; coffee and bread for breakfast. This, at least, was the diet in barracks before the war. It may have to be improved now that the French have learned how different is the feeding of the British soldier, even in peace-time.

The passing of certain examinations secured the privilege of serving only one year instead of three, but even one year usually leaves the educated young Frenchman resentful. What he detests most of all is the loss of liberty. He is at the mercy of officers and sergeants. He is a small part of a vast machine. No personal violence is permitted. The men cannot be struck or beaten, as they were in the German Army. The law is severe on that point. But there are other methods of making men uncomfortable, and, even though these may not be employed, the sense of confinement, of having lost the right to order one's own life, is irksome. Some desert, but not many, for the punishment is heavy. Those who are captured are sent to the disciplinary battalions stationed in Algeria. Here the discipline is rigid, even harsh. The unfortunate soldiers have a bad time of it. Deserters who stay out of France escape that, but they cannot return to their country until they have reached the age of forty-five.

It is possible, when the League of Nations has established itself and won confidence, that the new order in Europe may lead to the abolition of compulsory military service in France. This will mark an even greater change

MUSIC FOR A PYRENEAN FOLK DANCE

Folk dances are a popular form of recreation among the hardy folk of the Pyrenees. These two men supply the music with violin, flute, and a primitive form of wire piano struck with a piece of metal than any which took place at the time of the Revolution.

Somewhat apart temperamentally, as they are geographically, from the other French peasantry, the Corsicans deserve separate mention, and not only because of the statesmen and soldiers of Corsican origin, of whom Napoleon Bonaparte is supreme, who have held

COLOUR, LIFE, AND LAUGHTER HOLD UNDISPUTED SWAY DURING CARNIVAL
The streets of Nice are transformed during carnival, when the whole town becomes the scene of unrestrained gaiety. Decorative cars of elaborate design pass through the streets; "vegioni," or masked balls, are held in all the theatres, and a great battle of flowers takes place on the Promenade des Anglais. Firework displays, confetti fights, and dancing in the public squares are all indulged in

Photo, Donald McLeish

WHITE-HOODED REVELLERS AT THE FEET OF KING CARNIVAL IN NICE
 Nice, the famous pleasure resort on the south coast of France, holds a carnival on the twelve days preceding Lent, and also a shorter one, the Mi-Carême, in Mid-Lent. Huge plaster figures, elaborately designed and dressed, are drawn through the streets, their gaily-costumed escort indulging in confetti throwing. Many wear masks similar to those shown above, as a protection against plaster pellets

Photo, Horace W. Nicholls

MARKETING WARES PLEASING TO THE EYE AND PLEASANT TO THE TASTE
Nice, the beautiful capital of the Department of the Alpes Maritimes, offers many attractions in her market places; the fruit and flower markets, in particular, having a fascination all their own. Here colour runs riot the livelong day, and hundreds of women, quaintly attired in native dress, preside over large stalls or baskets laden with many-hued, perfumed blossoms, or with luscious sub-tropical fruits

Photo, Horace W. Nicholls

FORCIBLE FEEDING FOR THE FATTENING OF GESE

This French peasant woman is performing the first stage in the preparation of a much-esteemed delicacy. The geese are forcibly stuffed, and are kept in specially heated compartments, in order that their livers may become abnormally enlarged. These are then converted into the pâté de foie gras that appears on the table of the gourmet

WHERE LOVE OF CLEANLINESS TRIUMPHS OVER WINTER'S OBSTACLES

In marked contrast to their compatriots seen in the photograph below, these peasant women of the Chamonix district perform their duties under conditions that are far from enjoyable. Standing in deep snow, they have broken the ice in the trough that is placed near their village at the foot of Mont Blanc. To judge by their smiles, the prospect of washing their linen in ice-cold water holds no terrors for them

SIMPLE SCENE OF DOMESTIC INDUSTRY IN NICE

In the blue waters of the Baie des Anges, a stone's throw from the handsome Jetty Casino, they are washing clothes. A homely scene, in all truth, to be enacted in one of the most fashionable quarters of Nice. Nevertheless, these washerwomen appear quite unconscious of the gay crowd which parades the fine boulevards and the beautiful public gardens abounding in their immediate neighbourhood

Photos, Horace W. Nicholls

LIVE STOCK FOR SALE IN THE OLD MARKET PLACE OF SUNNY NICE

The climatic conditions of southern France enable the farm-folk to raise crops and poultry with more success and less labour than their kinsmen in the northern districts. Standing against the high whitewashed wall, and surrounded by crates containing live rabbits and pigeons, the smiling country-woman holds up a fine Belgian hare to catch the attention of the crowds that throng the market great place in French history. Occupying an island over-run by invaders more frequently perhaps than any other piece of the earth of equal size, they have preserved a patriotic ardour and an individual character quite remarkable in the circumstances.

Photo, Donald McLeish

It was in their immemorial resistance to absorption by foreign invaders that their distinctive institution, the vendetta, originated. Entirely fearless, and fiercely proud, they regard the slightest affront as a personal challenge to a duel to the death, the victor in which will have to answer with his life to the victim's family, until no survivor remains of either house, whether Montagu or Capulet. Despite their vindictiveness they are a deeply religious people, with many admirable qualities of frankness and good faith and, in particular, of generosity positively embarrassing to strangers.

To refuse their hospitality is to invite their very dangerous enmity; to accept it is to make a very charming friend, rough, it may be, but sociable and self-educated to no mean degree. In their lovely island these soldier-shepherds lead an indolent life, supporting themselves by hunting, shooting, and fishing, while their wives look after their crops, their vegetables, and their fruit.

WHERE MUCH CORSICAN HISTORY WAS MADE: THE OLD TOWN OF CORTE

Standing at the confluence of the Tavignano and Restonica rivers in the centre of the island, the upper town is built on the sides of a precipitous rock, on the summit of which stands an ancient citadel erected in the fifteenth century. The scene of many stormy conflicts in the past, the town now does a brisk trade in wine and timber. The island, the capital of which is Ajaccio, a port on its western shore, is noteworthy as the birthplace of Napoleon Bonaparte. Since Corsica was first colonised by the Phœnicians, it has been in many hands, finally passing to the French in 1796

France

II. The History of the French People

By Winifred Stephens

Author of "Women of the French Revolution" and "The France I Know"

FRENCH civilization is the most unbroken and one of the oldest in the world. Long before the dawn of history, on the walls and roofs of caves in south-eastern France, people of the Stone Age were painting pictures of fishes and bisons and short-frocked women dancing in a round. When France emerges from pre-history her civilization is found centring in settlements along the Mediterranean coast, of which, in 600 B.C., Marseilles was the most important.

From Julius Caesar to Hugh Capet

Some six centuries later Julius Caesar invaded France, or Gaul as he called it. It took him eight years to conquer the country. But he did it thoroughly; and the Romans planted their civilization so firmly on Gallic soil that to-day the French remain as conspicuously Latin in language and institutions as they are Celto-Frankish in race.

Inevitably Gaul, situated on the extreme verge of western Europe, served as a dumping ground for those hordes of barbarians—Belgae, Burgundians, Cymri, Goths, Huns, Franks, and Norsemen—who, from the fourth to the ninth centuries of our era, swept over the Roman Empire. Driven ever farther and farther west by the movements of other tribes behind them, these newcomers found, when they arrived in Gaul and Britain, the Atlantic Ocean blocking their progress westwards. Then came the clash of arms and the survival of the fittest—i.e., of the most warlike. In Gaul it was the Franks. The first great Frankish king was Clovis (470–511). Under him Gaul became Christian.

The descendants of Clovis, the Merovingians, continued in power until 753, when they were succeeded by the Carolingians. To this house belonged Charlemagne (742–814), the greatest conqueror since Caesar. He was crowned Emperor at Rome in 800, thus establishing what came to be known as the Holy Roman Empire. His kingdom, measuring a thousand miles from north to south and from east to west, extended from Spain to Hungary, from the Mediterranean to the Baltic and the North Sea. Wherever he pitched his camps he tried to evolve something like order out of the anarchy into which the barbarian invasions had thrown the old Roman Empire. But even he was powerless permanently to arrest the disintegration that was in rapid progress throughout Europe and which set in again everywhere after his death. His descendants made war upon one another for a century.

At the end of that time something like a Kingdom of France began to emerge. For in 987 the barons—we are now in the full tide of feudalism—passed over Charlemagne's descendant and elected in his stead a powerful noble who was not a Carolingian: Hugh, Duke of the Franks and Count of Paris, surnamed Capet, or the short cloaked (from cappa, the Gallo-Latin word for short cloak). Hugh's descendants ruled in France for eight centuries. His duchy of France gave its name to Gaul. His capital, Paris, became the capital of the new kingdom of France. The language of the duchy, "la langue d'oïl" later "oui," became the language of the kingdom, degrading to a mere patois the "langue d'oc" of the south.

But even after his election Hugh Capet was little more than the most powerful among the great French barons, and his kingdom hardly greater than the present Île de France. Henceforward, for the next four centuries, French history resolves itself into a struggle between the King and his vassals, a struggle in which, little by little, the King established his supremacy, winning the great feudal fiefs one by one by conquest or inheritance, until in the reign of Louis XI., 1461–83, France stood a compact kingdom with her frontiers rounded and well defined, a highly centralized monarchy, instead of a loose assemblage of more or less independent states. When Louis XI. died, only one fief, Brittany, remained to come in, and Louis' daughter, Anne of Beaujeu, whom he left as regent, arranged a marriage between her brother, King Charles VIII. (1470–98), and Anne Duchess of Brittany, which resulted in Brittany's annexation to the French crown.

Religious and Dynastic Wars

In the building of this immense edifice of the French monarchy the two outstanding movements of medieval France, the Crusades (eight in all—the first in 1096, the last in 1270), and the Hundred Years War with England (1338–1453) were stages or episodes. There can be little doubt that French kings welcomed as an outlet for the turbulence of their unruly barons the holy wars inspired by the wave of intense religious emotion which swept over Europe and which hurled the flower of western Christendom against the Saracen. The Hundred Years War had its dynastic pretext, Edward III.'s claim to the French crown, and its industrial interest, England's desire to prevent France from acquiring the Flemish markets so necessary for English wool. But apart from these dynastic and industrial interests the war originated in the effort of Edward of England to reinstate himself in the duchy of Normandy, forfeited by his grandfather King John at the Battle of Bouvines (1214), and to hold his fief of Aquitaine against the aggression of King Philip of France (1293-50), who was there his overlord.

FRANCE & ITS STORY

Final Expulsion of the English

Fortune favoured first one side then the other. At times, after Crecy (1346), Poitiers (1356), and Agincourt (1415), it looked as if ultimately the English would be victorious. But again and again French national feeling asserted itself until, fanned into an all-consuming flame by the heroic leadership and martyrdom of Joan of Arc (1412-31), the invaders were finally driven out. Henceforward they retained nothing of all their vast possessions save Calais, and this was won back by the Duke of Guise in 1558. The peasant class to which Joan belonged has in more recent times frequently played a decisive part in French politics. Before Joan's day it had already asserted itself in a rising of the peasants, "les Jacques Bonhommes," the "Hodges," as we should say, known as "la Jacquerie" (1358).

Close of the Medieval Period

In the towns at the same time the middle class, la bourgeoisie, was also becoming politically articulate. Representatives from the towns, men of le tiers état (third estate), were summoned by the King to meet nobles and clergy in les États Généraux (States General). The towns received from their sovereign charters and other privileges. Their power reached its height when after Poitiers, while King John was a prisoner in England, a Parisian draper, Étienne Marcel, practically ruled the kingdom for two years. With Marcel's assassination in 1358 the movement collapsed, and with it for the time being the political power of the middle class. Henceforward the States General were summoned less and less frequently, indeed only fifteen times between 1358 and 1614, and then not at all until the Revolution.

That medieval prosperity of the towns which had rendered Marcel's brief reign possible was only one phase of the rich culture which had arisen throughout France in the twelfth, thirteenth, and fourteenth centuries. So deeply had this culture taken root that not even the ravages of the Hundred Years War had been able to destroy it. It had produced Gothic cathedrals, marvels of domestic architecture, treasures of tapestry, wood-carving, wrought iron and jewel work, literary masterpieces, and so fine an erudition that the university of Paris came to be known as "the oven in which was baked the intellectual bread of the whole world." But by the middle of the fifteenth century the impulse which had produced this culture—religious emotion on the one hand, contact with the East through the Crusades on the other—had spent itself. About 1453, a year which for many reasons may be taken to mark the close of medieval and the beginning of modern history, France was for the moment living on her past. Even then, however, in political, scientific, literary, social and religious spheres, events were preparing which were to renew her youth.

The Renaissance in France

The invention of gunpowder, leading to the use of artillery and firearms, was rendering private warfare more and more difficult, and placing the means of defence and attack in the hands of the central power. The newly invented art of printing, introduced into France in 1469, was about to deal deadly blows at medieval traditions in science, literature, and religion. The discovery of the New World by Columbus (1492) was to open up new fields for activity and expansion. Then, just at this time, the Italian wars brought France into contact with the centres in which all this new life was seething.

Defence and aggression have shaped the States of the world. No sooner had France, at the end of the fifteenth century, succeeded in effectually defending herself against the English, than she began to make wars of conquest. Louis XI.'s annexation of Burgundy had made France a great medieval and Alpine power. Her kings, from their newly acquired Alpine fortresses, cast covetous glances on the rich plains of Italy. Reviving old dynastic claims to the kingdom of Naples and the Duchy of Milan, Charles VIII. and Louis XII. led their soldiers and, for the first time, a train of artillery across the Alps (1494-1513).

Though almost negligible from the point of view of conquest, resulting in no permanent territorial acquisitions beyond a few Piedmontese fortresses, retained till the seventeenth century, the cultural and political importance of the Italian adventure can with difficulty be overrated. The French invaders, when they returned from Italy, had caught the spirit of the Italian Renaissance. Through them it took root in France. It blossomed in the reigns of Francis I., 1515-47, and Henry II., 1547-59, in works of art and literature. A reformed French language, the beginning of modern French, enriched by Rabelais, purified by Du Bellay, fixed by Montaigne, was getting ready to be standardized by the French Academy which Richelieu founded in the following century (1635).

FRANCE & ITS STORY

The political result of the Italian adventure was that it brought France up against a new enemy: the Empire—i.e., the Holy Roman Empire of Charlemagne. Though still nominally elective, it had now become almost hereditary in the Austrian House of Hapsburg. Ruling in Spain, for a while in the Netherlands, and with vast possessions in the New World, the Empire threatened to upset the balance of power in Europe.

The quarrel between Austria and France broke out over the rival French and Spanish claims to the kingdom of Naples.

Fought firstly in Italy, later on the north-eastern frontier of France, it continued through the reigns of Francis I. and Henry II., until the French became so occupied by religious disputes culminating in civil war that they were for a time no longer able to engage in foreign conquests.

John Calvin (1509-64) was a Frenchman, settled at Geneva. When the Reformation according to Calvin first spread across the Rhine into France, for a time the national religion hung in the balance. Was it to be Roman or Genevese? The King, Francis I., himself sometimes seemed to waver. The middle class of the south and south-west followed Calvin, so did half the nobility. But the successors of Francis I., Henry II., Francis II., 1559-60, Charles IX., 1560-74, Henry III., 1574-89, all threw their weight into the Roman scale. They did their best by persecution and force of arms to trample out the Reformation—"l'Huguenotterie," as it was called. The derivation of the term

FRANCE: ITS OLD PROVINCES, PEOPLES, AND CHIEF TOWNS

FRANCE & ITS STORY

Huguenot is doubtful. It may have come from the German word, "Eidgenossen" (companions), used to describe the Swiss Reformers.

The Huguenots' military leader, the famous Admiral Coligny (born 1519), was butchered at Paris on St. Bartholomew's Day, August 22, 1572. At the same time in the capital and throughout France, at the instigation probably of the Florentine Queen Mother, Catherine de' Medici, perished some 20,000 of Coligny's co-religionaries. But such massacres only fanned the flame of religious independence and of that spirit of political revolt which was closely allied with it. For thirty years (1564-94) the civil wars of religion devastated France, until the crown fell to Henry of Navarre, the Huguenot leader. Then Henry, throwing over Calvinism with that famous phrase, "Paris is well worth a Mass," restored peace to his distracted kingdom and restored France to the Roman Dominion. But by the Edict of Nantes (1598) Henry granted the Huguenots liberty of conscience, and in certain towns permission to worship according to Protestant rites.

Henri IV., Statesman and King

Of all the forty kings who have reigned in France since Clovis, Henri Quatre, 1594-1610, was the greatest and most beloved. He found France rent asunder by civil strife, decimated by famine, effaced in the politics of nations. He left her united, strong and prosperous, one of the leading Powers in Europe. All this he achieved in sixteen years, for his beneficent reign was cut short by the knife of a Catholic fanatic, Ravallac, who could not forgive the King for having been a Huguenot. The personification of French liberalism, both at home and abroad, Henry had protected the peasant and the artisan, and been the first of modern statesmen to conceive the idea of something like a league of nations. A hundred years later, after the Treaty of Utrecht, the idea was revived by the Abbé de Saint-Pierre, two hundred years later still by M. Léon Bourgeois (who afterwards was the first representative of France on the League of Nations) in his book "Solidarité," published in 1908.

After Henry's death his policy was completely reversed by the two great statesmen, Richelieu (1585-1642) and Mazarin (1602-61), who followed him, and by his grandson Louis XIV. (1638-1715). At home these statesmen ruled with an iron hand, crushing the liberties of the individual, especially of the turbulent barons and of the Huguenots. Abroad they put their faith in armies and launched on a career of conquest. In 1636 Richelieu joined in the Thirty Years War against the Empire.

The brilliant victories of Condé and Turenne brought the war to a happy conclusion, as far as France was concerned. In 1648, by the Treaty of Westphalia, France obtained the acknowledgment of her right to the three frontier bishoprics—Metz, Toul, and Verdun—conquered by Henry II. At the same time her enemy, the Empire, was weakened by the establishment of the independence of the United Provinces and by the splitting up of Germany into a large number of independent states. For eleven years after the Treaty of Westphalia, France continued at war with Spain, until, by the Treaty of the Pyrenees, she again won more territory—Roussillon in the south, and in the north and east a few places in Lorraine and the Netherlands.

The Golden Age of Louis XIV.

We are now in the full tide of the reign of Louis XIV., of the Great Century, as it is called, 1643-1715. It may be regarded from two different points of view. From one Louis appears everywhere as "le Grand Monarque." In politics he is a beneficent tyrant dominating over the most glorious period in the whole of French history, a triumphant conqueror, finally overcoming Austria, the hereditary enemy of his kingdom, giving France the hegemony of Europe, extending his dominions until they stretch in one solid and unbroken mass from the Atlantic Ocean to the Rhine. In literature and art, as a bountiful Maecenas, he presides over a dazzling Augustan age, when, as Lord Acton said, Europe's thinking was done for her by France. From the other point of view, Louis XIV. appears as the evil genius of France, a despotic and spendthrift monarch, whose oppressive and reckless extravagance led ultimately to the crash of the Great Revolution.

The Reverse of the Medal

It is in 1685 that this dark aspect of the century begins to open up. In that year Louis laid the coping-stone on his anti-liberal policy by revoking the Edict of Nantes and sending into banishment, to enrich England and Holland, many of his most prosperous subjects. Two years earlier Louis' greatest minister, Colbert, had died. Bereft of his restraining influence and of his genius for finance, the King rapidly led his country down the road to financial ruin. In war, every battle, every siege was a pageant. In peace, Louis poured out money like water on fêtes and vast building schemes at Versailles and at Marly. Meanwhile, up and down his provinces the exactions of his tax-gatherers were reducing the peasants to a servitude and a beggary worse than anything they had endured in the Middle Ages. Towards the end of the century not even military glory gilded this misery. For Louis' generals were no longer winning brilliant victories. In his last war (1702-14), fought in order to establish his grandson, Philip of Anjou, on the Spanish throne, against the Empire, England, the United Provinces, Brandenburg or Prussia, and Savoy, though Louis attained his dynastic object he won no accession of territory; on the contrary, with his surrender of Nova Scotia to England, there set in that conquest by England of French colonial possessions in America and India which continued for the next half century. The treaties of Utrecht and Rastadt, terminating the war of the Spanish Succession, were signed in 1713-14. The following year Louis XIV.'s death closed the longest reign in French history.

FRANCE & ITS STORY

Discredit Brought Upon the Monarchy

The minority which now occurred, the Regency of the little King's cousin, Philip Duke of Orléans (1715-23), was a period of almost unqualified disaster for France. When Louis XV. came of age things began to look a little brighter. In a war against Prussia and England, Louis commanded his army in person, and at Fontenoy (1745) won the first battle since the opening of the Hundred Years War in which a French king had defeated an English army. Louis, "le Bien Aimé" (the well-beloved), as he was then called, was at that time so much the hero of his people that the news of his serious illness spread panic among them. But the growing discontent with the exactions of the monarchy and the vices in which the King now began to indulge brought about so complete a revulsion of feeling during the remaining years of the reign, that when, after Louis' death from small-pox in 1774, his coffin was borne by night to the royal sepulchre in the Abbey of St. Denis, it was greeted with insults.

Neither the virtues of Louis XVI., 1774-93, nor the wise government of his ministers, Turgot and Necker, two of the ablest of French statesmen, could avert the Revolution which Louis XIV.'s despotism and extravagance and Louis XV.'s vices had rendered inevitable. Not even the revival of the French navy and French successes, chiefly maritime, during the American War of Independence (1776-83), in which France joined as the ally of the colonies, could restore the popularity of the French monarchy. And it was not that institution alone that had fallen into discredit. From the appearance of Montesquieu's famous masterpiece, "l'Esprit des Lois" (1748), there was hardly an institution, social, political, or religious, which by Montesquieu, Voltaire, Diderot, or Rousseau had not been tried and found wanting.

The revolutionary ideas of these philosophers were spreading throughout the kingdom. By a certain section of the nobility, by the Comte de Mirabeau, for example, they were eagerly welcomed.

Mutterings of the Coming Storm

These seigneurs, descendants of the old feudal barons, had had their political aspirations stifled by Richelieu and Mazarin. By Louis XIV. they had been converted into mere courtiers, striving to outdazzle one another at Versailles and Fontainebleau. Their lavish expenditure at the court and in the wars of Louis XIV. had involved them in ruin. They still retained certain feudal privileges—exemption from taxation and the right to exact dues, tithes, and tolls from the dwellers on their domains. But privileges alone, without duties, remained to these ghosts of feudal barons, for the administrative functions they formerly exercised had devolved on the King's officers, "les intendants."

In many cases the impoverished nobles had been compelled to sell land to the peasants. Oppressed by every conceivable hardship and exaction, paying in many cases four-fifths of what they earned to the King, the lord, and the Church, these down-trodden peasants somehow, though it seems well-nigh incredible, contrived to prosper. Hence, even before the Revolution, there was growing up in France that system of peasant proprietorship which has remained ever since the main feature of French land tenure. Peasant holdings before the Revolution occupied as much as one-third of the kingdom.

Destruction of the Bastille

Meanwhile, France was threatened with bankruptcy. To devise measures to avert the crash the States General were summoned for the first time after an interval of 175 years. They met at Versailles on May 5, 1789. With that meeting the Revolution began. This National Assembly, called later the Constituent, the first of the three great Revolution parliaments, sat until September, 1791; the second, the Legislative Assembly, sat until September, 1792; the third, the Convention, until October, 1795. When the States General first assembled few realized what that meeting portended. Only a few weeks later, when Paris rose and destroyed the royal fortress of the Bastille, on July 14, Louis exclaimed to his minister: "It is a revolt, then!" "Sire, it is a revolution!" was the reply.

The Bastille's destruction was the first great popular manifestation of the Revolution. The second occurred on October 5, when a disorderly rout, chiefly women and men dressed as women, marched from Paris to Versailles. Invading the Assembly Hall, penetrating even into the royal palace, they demanded corn for the famished capital, vengeance on Louis' Austrian Queen, Marie Antoinette, whom they accused of being the cause of all their troubles, and the presence of the King among his people in the metropolis. On the following day the petitioners returned to Paris, bringing with them the King, the Queen, and the Royal Family.

FRANCE & ITS STORY

Seizure of the Royal Family

The lugubrious procession was preceded by the heads of two of the King's bodyguards, who had been murdered in the palace that morning, borne aloft on pikes. Soon after the Assembly followed the King to Paris and established itself in the Riding School, close to the Tuileries Palace, where the King was henceforward virtually a prisoner. Paris now became the centre of the Revolution. Already the old régime had vanished and political equality had been born when, on the famous night of August 4, the nobles and clergy had, at a meeting of the National Assembly renounced their privileges. Then came the abolition of the divine right of the King, who became a mere functionary of the State, and the confiscation of Church property. This was an attempt to restore financial order by the issue of paper money (assignats), with the confiscated property as security. At the same time an oath of allegiance to the new constitution was exacted from the clergy.

Throughout the first two years of the Revolution there was no question of deposing the King, and much less of abolishing royalty. The first constitution, drawn up by the Constituent Assembly and confirmed by Louis in the autumn of 1791, vested executive power in the King, and legislative power was exacted from the Assembly of 745 members elected indirectly for two years by the eighty-three departments which had taken the place of the old provinces.

Execution of the King and Queen

But Republicanism had even then begun to gain ground. It received a great impetus by the attempted flight of the King and the Royal Family in the summer of that year, and was further encouraged by the belief that the Royalist emigrants were in league with the European Powers to restore the old régime, and that this league had the sympathy of the King and his family as well as of all in France who were not taking an active part in the Revolution.

To this firm conviction of the Revolutionary party may be mainly ascribed most of the important events of 1792 :

the declaration of war against Austria, the two attacks of the Parisians on the Tuileries on June 20 and August 10, the imprisonment of the King and his family in the Temple, the invasion of the prisons by the populace and the massacre of twelve to sixteen hundred prisoners, the proclamation of the Republic, and finally the King's trial and execution on January 21, 1793, followed by the Queen's execution on October 16 of the same year.

The country was declared to be in danger ; and well it might be. The ill-equipped Revolutionary armies were no match for the enemy, who was marching on the capital. First Prussia, then England, joined Austria in making war on the Revolutionary government. The general of the Revolutionary army, Dumouriez, went over to the enemy. Every frontier was threatened. Paris was without bread and without money. The Royalists on the west had risen against the Republic. The Girondists (so called because most of the deputies who formed the party represented departments in la Gironde) driven from office and from the Convention, had raised the standard of revolt in Normandy.

France Under the Terror

The extreme Revolutionary party, the Jacobins (named after the famous revolutionary club to which most of them belonged), led by Robespierre (1758-94), were now in power. They believed that the only way to save France was by a Reign of Terror carried out by the Revolutionary Tribunal and the Committee of Public Safety. Holocausts of victims perished daily beneath the guillotine set up on what is now La Place de la Concorde. But the Terrorists were constantly falling out among themselves. Mère Guillotine devoured two of Robespierre's former friends, Camille Desmoulins and Danton (April, 1794). Finally, the Terror ended when Robespierre's own turn came on July 28, 1794.

The one part of the Terrorists' work that had prospered was the war. Long before Robespierre's fall all danger from the frontiers had vanished. Distracted France never showed herself more vigorous than during those ghastly months when she raised for her defence no fewer than 600,000 volunteers. On the line from Strasbourg to the sea four armies defended her ; in the west two more held the Pyrenees ; another watched the Royalist insurgents of La Vendée ; while in the south-east the army which had just driven the English from Toulon waited for a new commander. He came in the person of General Napoleon Bonaparte (born 1769). He had already made his mark in home politics, when in the street battle round the Church of S. Roch on October 5, 1795, he had turned his artillery on the mob and saved the National Convention. Three weeks later the Convention dissolved, having completed a constitution which instituted the Directory. The Directory was the Revolutionary government. It lasted until Bonaparte abolished it on his return from Egypt in 1798. By establishing the Consulate in its place, Bonaparte practically took the government into his own hands.

FRANCE & ITS STORY

Thus the movement which had begun in 1789 with the Declaration of the Rights of Man ended in a military despotism. As First Consul for ten years, then for life, and finally in 1804 as Emperor, Napoleon, though he kept up the form of a Senate, was in reality absolute.

In secular matters, in the Civil Code, drawn up between 1804 and 1810, Napoleon was inclined on the whole to follow the lines already traced by the Revolutionary governments. And with but a few modifications the Code has continued ever since to determine legislation civil, commercial, criminal, and penal.

Napoleon and the First Empire

In ecclesiastical affairs Napoleon was reactionary. He abolished Robespierre's worship of the Supreme Being, and by the Concordat (1801) re-established the Catholic Church on a footing which continued until the separation of Church and State in 1905. Following in the footsteps of the medieval Philippe le Bel, 1285-1314, who had brought Pope Clement V. to Avignon—where the Popes remained for seventy years (1308-78), a period known as "the Babylonian Captivity"—Napoleon brought Pius VII. to Paris to crown him with the crown of Charlemagne in Notre Dame. But when the crucial moment arrived, as Pope Pius lifted the crown from the altar, Napoleon seized it, and with his own hands set it firmly on his brows. "I found the crown of France in the gutter," he said afterwards, "and I picked it up on the point of my sword."

While at home Napoleon was organizing, if not creating, modern France, abroad he was winning the victories—Marengo, 1800; Austerlitz, 1805; Jena, 1806; Eylau, 1807; Wagram, 1809—which were to restore to France all her old conquests and much more. On the north, in 1811, the new France extended to the Baltic, including Brussels and the Scheldt; on the south as far as Rome itself; and beyond the Adriatic to the Illyrian Provinces. In addition, numerous other European States had been carved up into republics dependent on France, or kingdoms ruled over by Napoleon's brothers and generals.

But such a power, ignoring as it did all past traditions, all national feeling, all distinctions of race and language, was bound to break up, even without any foreign attack. From the beginning, however, from the Battle of the Nile (1798) to Trafalgar (1805) and on to Waterloo (1815), Napoleon had met two invincible enemies, the sea and the maritime power of England.

From Trafalgar to Waterloo

And the tide began definitely to turn against him when he found himself up against England (represented by Wellington), in the Peninsular War (1808-14). It became still more adverse in the disastrous failure of the Russian campaign. Then in 1814, after Germany, at Leipzig, had thrown off the conqueror's yoke, came a series of battles in which Napoleon, though resisting magnificently, was driven back and back until he was forced to abdicate at Fontainebleau on April 6, 1814.

Eleven months later the exile had escaped from his microscopic empire of Elba, to which his enemies had banished him. He was back in France, marching towards Paris with an army of 1,500 men. The restored Bourbon, Louis XVIII., fled, and Napoleon entered Paris on March 20, 1815.

The Powers who were remaking the map of Europe at Vienna hastily broke up their conference, placed Napoleon under their ban, and each engaged to furnish a force of 180,000 men against him. In face of such a combination not even a Napoleon could stand. On June 18 his failure to prevent the junction of the British and Prussian armies lost him the Battle of Waterloo. Throwing himself on the mercy of his greatest enemy, he surrendered to the English on board the man-of-war Bellerophon, and by the unanimous resolve of the Allies was transported a prisoner of war to St. Helena, where he died in 1821.

Restoration of the Monarchy

After Waterloo, the French, for a time at any rate, had had enough of wars. Peace at any price was the foreign policy of the restored Bourbon monarchy. There were only two exceptions—a short war with Turkey, in which the Turkish fleet was practically annihilated at Navarino (1827), and the war against Algerian pirates, which resulted in the conquest of Algiers (1830).

In home affairs they tried the experiment of constitutional monarchy. It was a failure. The elder Bourbons, Louis XVIII., 1814-24, and Charles X., 1824-30, had been born and bred in the divine right of kings, and could not find it in their nature to govern constitutionally. But the Orléans branch of the Bourbon house, descended from a younger son of Henri Quatre, had always represented French liberalism. And when the Revolution of July, 1830, put on the throne Louis Philippe, Duke of Orléans, who had fought in the armies of the Great Revolution, and whose father, Egalité, was one of the Great Revolution leaders, much was expected of this liberal prince, and of the new constitution which cleared away the last vestiges of feudalism and with them the theory of the divine right of kings.

The Revolution of 1848

Great was the disappointment, therefore, when the July government turned out to be as much a one-class rule as that of the elder Bourbons, the only difference being that under them it had been the aristocracy that governed, while under Louis Philippe it was the rich bourgeoisie. After eighteen years of it the discontent of the unrepresented professional classes, small shopkeepers, artisans, and peasants, culminated in another revolution, which drove the last French monarch from the throne, and compelled him and his minister, Guizot, to fly for their lives.

The Republican Government which followed was short-lived. After some months of anarchy the nation elected Napoleon Bonaparte, nephew of the great Napoleon, president for four years. The National Assembly's attempt to restrict manhood suffrage, the great conquest of the 1848 Revolution, gave the president an excuse for his coup d'état of December, 1851. He dissolved the Assembly, restored manhood suffrage, and appealed to the nation, with the result that he was made Emperor.

Brilliance of the Second Empire

In commercial and industrial affairs the Second Empire was a period of immense prosperity; France was covered with railroads—the Suez Canal was constructed by M. de Lesseps (opened 1869); great cities, like Marseilles, were practically rebuilt; and Paris was transformed by Haussmann. But in the intellectual and political sphere it was the negation of freedom. This, the great writers of the day, Victor Hugo—who remained in exile throughout—Michelet, Taine, and Renan, knew too well.

Abroad, true to the Napoleonic tradition, the Second Empire reversed the policy of the Restoration and plunged France into foreign wars: The Crimean War (1854-56), the war with China (1857-60), with Austria (1859-61), resulting in the acquisition by France of Nice and Savoy, and the establishment of Italian unity, and the disastrous Mexican Expedition which ended in 1867. The Emperor's clerical policy made France the supporter of the Pope's temporal power against the new Italian Government; and from 1861 until the Franco-Prussian War French troops protected the Vatican.

Meanwhile, on the eastern frontier, a rivalry was growing up between France and Prussia, which was to dominate European and even world politics from that time to this. France wanted the Rhine frontier, which had been hers from 1795 till 1814. Prussia, ever since the Treaty of Utrecht had made her a kingdom, had been advancing with ominous strides. From the day when her defeat of Austria in the Battle of Sadowa (1866) marked her out as the leader of the Germanic States, Prussia and France were like two locomotives rushing towards one another on a single track. The collision occurred on July 19, 1870, when France declared war against Prussia.

From 1870 to the End of the Great War

Space does not permit us to describe the incidents which led up to it—the Luxembourg affair, 1867; the French Army Bill, 1868; and the Hohenzollern candidature to the Spanish throne. The French Minister of War, Leboeuf, had boasted: "We are ready, more than ready. There is not a gaiter-button missing." In truth, nothing was ready, as was seen in six weeks of defeats: Weissenburg, Wörth, Spicheren, Gravelotte, and finally Sedan, where the whole Imperial army, including the Emperor with his mountains of luggage ("Empereur Colis" he was called), were prisoners in the hands of the Germans. Two days later, the Emperor having abdicated, the Third Republic was proclaimed in Paris. Meanwhile the Prussians were marching on the city. They invested it on September 19.

Through nearly five months the Parisians held out, amidst terrible privations and much internal dissension, and subjected towards the end to a severe bombardment. On January 29, 1871, imminent starvation compelled them to capitulate. Eleven days earlier, the New German Empire had been born at Versailles, in the very Hall of Mirrors which was to witness the signing of that Empire's doom forty-eight years later. The Treaty of Frankfurt (May 10, 1871) deprived France of all Alsace, except Belfort, and of part of Lorraine, including Metz. It condemned her to pay a war indemnity of five milliards, and until the indemnity should be paid established a German army on French soil.

With marvellous energy the French rallied from defeat. To the disgust and surprise of the Germans, by September, 1873, they had paid their war indemnity, and been released from the presence of the German army of occupation.

FRANCE & ITS STORY

The Third Republic has given France its most stable Government since the Revolution, and a constitution—the tenth since 1789—that weathered numerous crises, including the Great War, at the termination of which it may be regarded as standing more firmly established than ever before.

FRANCE: FACTS AND FIGURES

The Country

Massive hexagonal, about 600 miles north to south, 560 miles west to east, and 680 miles north-west to south-east. Coastline of 1,304 miles on Atlantic, and 456 miles on Mediterranean; land frontier about 1,665 miles. Very fertile plains and high bare plateaux, great rivers (Loire, 650 miles; Rhone, 507 miles; Seine, 485 miles; Garonne, 378 miles; Marne, 326 miles; Somme, 150 miles), and frontier mountain ranges east and south (Jura, Alps, and Pyrenees).

Alsace-Lorraine, 5,605 square miles, and 1,709,750 population, restored to France after Great War, with rights of exploitation of coal mines in Saar basin, an area of about 750 square miles, and population of 657,870, who, after fifteen years, are to vote for continuance of rule by League of Nations commission or union with France or Germany. Total area of France with restored territory, 212,659 square miles, with population in 1921 of 39,209,766. The island of Corsica, in the Mediterranean, south of Genoa, is 3,367 square miles in area, with a population of 288,800, mostly Italians.

Government and Constitution

Republic, under constitution of 1875, and since modified. President elected for seven years. Chamber of 610 Deputies, elected for four years by manhood suffrage, and Senate of 314 elected for nine years, except 75 elected for life, together form National Assembly. Conseil d'Etat, appointed by President, is final court for suits and prepares rules for public administration. Country is divided into ninety departments.

Defence

Land defences include former German fortress of Strasbourg in Alsace, and Metz and Thionville in Lorraine. Other fortresses are Verdun, Toul, Epinal, and Belfort. Toulon, Rochefort, Lorient, Brest, and Cherbourg are fortified naval harbours. Universal service enabled France to place in the field, in two weeks after the outbreak of the Great War, 3,781,000 men, with 92,000 officers; in 1918 this force had risen to 5,000,000 men and 128,000 officers, including colonial forces.

The navy, which is manned partly by conscription and partly by voluntary enlistment, has a reserve of 114,000 men, with about 25,500 on active service, and is undergoing revision. The battle fleet in 1922 included two pre-Dreadnoughts, seven Dreadnoughts, eight armoured cruisers, and five cruisers.

Commerce and Industries

In 1921 the area under wheat was 13,245,000 acres; mixed corn, 271,000; rye, 2,185,000; barley, 1,662,000; oats, 8,346,000. The area under vines in 1920 was 3,726,620 acres, yielding 1,300,200,000 gallons of wine. Fruit culture and Abroad, the Third Republic has given France a colonial dominion in area second only to that of Great Britain. But with the memory of two German invasions in a lifetime; in the presence of her ten devastated departments; crippled by the loss of more than a million of her sons; with an overwhelming burden of debt, France still remains obsessed by German peril and the need of assuring against it.

silk industry extensive. Farm animals: About 2,543,000 horses, 12,782,000 cattle, 9,373,000 sheep and lambs, 4,584,000 pigs, 1,228,600 goats, 297,500 asses, and 178,500 mules. There are over 40,000 mines and quarries in which minerals and metals are worked, and over 70 sugar works. The mercantile marine has a tonnage of over 3,000,000.

Chief exports: Cotton tissues, silk tissues, wool, woollen tissues, wines, smallwares, automobiles, silks, millinery, artificial flowers, raw and dressed skins, tools and metal goods, machinery, pig-iron, butter, table fruits, refined sugar, brandy, liqueurs, fish, cheese, etc. Chief imports: Wool, cotton, coal, silk, oleaginous fruits and seeds, machinery, raw skins, cereals, timber, caoutchouc, copper, petroleum oils, coffee, and wines. Totals in 1921: Exports, 21,553,000,000 francs; imports, 23,548,000,000 francs. Value of franc of 100 centimes, in normal conditions, 25.225 to the £ sterling, was in Oct., 1921, 53.28; in Nov., 1922, 67.

Communications

Railway mileage about 26,250; under construction, 790; projected, 688. Navigable river mileage in use, 3,800; canals, 3,620. There are over 450,000 miles of telegraph wires, and over 790,000 miles of telephone lines.

Chief Towns

Paris, capital (population in 1921, 2,906,470), Marseilles (586,340), Lyons (561,590), Bordeaux (267,410), Lille (209,950), Nantes (183,700), Toulouse (175,430), St. Etienne (167,970), Strasbourg (166,770), Nice (155,840), Le Havre (163,370), Rouen (123,700), Roubaix (113,260), Nancy (113,220), Toulon (106,330), Mulhouse (99,220), Amiens (92,780), Limoges (90,180), Angers, Nîmes, Clermont-Ferrand, Rennes, Montpellier, Tourcoing, Dijon, Grenoble, Reims, St. Denis, Tours, Brest, Levallois-Perret, Calais, Le Mans, Orleans, Boulogne-sur-Seine, Versailles, Metz (between 86,000 and 62,000).

Religion and Education

The country is chiefly Roman Catholic. When the Church was disestablished in 1905, religious bodies were authorised to form associations for public worship. The Roman Catholics have 17 archbishops and 68 bishops, and 51,000 clergy, exclusive of Alsace-Lorraine, Algeria, and colonies. Of 30,000 men and 130,000 women under vows in 1905, many left France, and Protestants number about 1,000,000. Educational system highly developed, and the primary schools are secular, compulsory, and free from age of six to thirteen. For boys and girls over thirteen years of age there are state lycées, high schools, a number of State universities, technical colleges, schools of fine arts, and conservatoires of music and the drama, and an excellent system of training teachers.

FRENCH EQUATORIAL AFRICA: SINGING DEATH-DANCE OF THE CANNIBAL ZANDÉ TRIBESWOMEN

This tribe has been tamed by the Belgians, and the women are dancing and singing on Sunday afternoon to entertain some Government officials. But all the Zandé, who spread into British and French territory, are not yet subdued. Any captive round whom the women of a wild tribe dance in slow rotation, singing to the beat of tom-toms, is destined soon to die and become the principal dish in the feast

Photo, H. Lang. Congo Expedition, American Museum of Natural History

France

III. Her Colonial Empire & Its Native Races

By Gabrielle Vassal & Edward Wright

A conspectus is given here of the peoples and lands of the colonies and dependencies of France, in Africa, America, Asia, and Australasia, in a series of five articles including an historical sketch. Separate articles on Algeria, Andorra, Annam, Cambodia, Dahomey, Madagascar, Morocco, and Tunis appear under their own headings

1. African Lands & Peoples

IN size, population, and resources, French Africa is one of the great achievements of modern times. It comprises nearly half a continent, with about one quarter of the people. It has given France considerable stretches of good land and perfect climate, suitable for white settlement. It has provided her with a good share of the tropic produce of increasing value for northern nations, and, what is of high importance, it has brought into the orbit of European culture a hardy race of mountaineers of European type, who seem to be able to breed as well in the tropical as in the temperate zone. Reunited with their very ancient kinsmen, this white race, that is spread from the southern Mediterranean coast through the Sahara to the bank of the Niger, may bring the European to an equality with the Chinese in the power of ranging through all climates.

Berber and Beduin Bow to France

The northern regions of French Africa are described in detail in the chapters on Algeria, Morocco, and Tunis. We can, therefore, open with the Mauritania (or Senegambia) country, extending between the barrier of the Atlas Mountains and the Senegal River. It connects with the French Sudan and Sahara, the Military Territory of the Niger and the Lake Chad country and Tibesti highlands, all forming an uninterrupted stretch of about 2,600 miles of tropic wilderness.

One old native race holds this great desert, from the Wad Nun pastures by the Atlantic to the rain-fed Tibesti mountains of the Libyan Desert. It is the Berber race, that wandered from the Atlas at some time unknown, and bred the racing dromedary that can feed on the scrub of the Sahara. Upon these nomad Berbers have descended Beduin tribes from the Saracen days, and after more than a thousand years of fighting and religious intrigue, the Berber resumed the mastery of the desert, but he, too, fell before the forces of France. Alongside some of the migrant Arabs he still holds more than three hundred thousand square miles of closed territory in Mauritania, together with a formidable mass of the mountains of Morocco. This free country has become the refuge of the old lords of the desert, commonly called by the nickname of Tuareg.

White Lords of the Desert

These were the men who formed the cavalry with which Hannibal continually defeated the legions of Rome, and lost his last battle because they would no longer serve him. When the Romans invaded the settled part of Barbary, from Tunis to Morocco, these men stayed the advance of Rome, and then freed their countrymen. If France can subdue and civilize them, she will strengthen herself immensely, and her French Berbers will add to the general power of the entire European stock of white men, for the Tuareg is a white man of fine type who can breed and flourish in tropic heat, while his kinsmen, the settled Kabyle, can equally thrive in the snow and thin air of the highland pastures of the Atlas and Tibesti mountains.

The Tuaregs are skeletons of white skin and cordlike sinew. They live on fermented camel milk, dates, and a

THE TOUCH OF LIFE WHICH BREAKS THE ENDLESS MONOTONY OF UNDULATING SAND IN A DESERT LANDSCAPE
Winding here and there over the vast spaces of the Sahara, the world's largest desert, are tracks beaten flat by the traffic which during the ages has made its way from one point to another in this immeasurable ocean of sand. Along these lonely highways passes many a camel caravan, bathed in the dazzling golden glow of sun and sand, like a thin stream of life crossing the limitless sea of eternity

CAMPING-GROUND OF A NOMAD TRIBE ON THE WILD SANDY TRACTS OF THE SAHARA DESERT

In strange, unexpected places life abounds in the Sahara, and the wandering nomadic races know full well the habitable regions of the great desert. Many of these tribes are purely pastoral, by no means bloodthirsty marauders or "pirates of the desert," as they have been fantastically represented by old writers. When possible, they encamp within view of a chain of mountains, from which will descend the rains that will cover their resting-place in spring with fine vegetation little meal, and from the days of the Roman Empire they have been famous for their extraordinary length of life. Death from sickness at the age of eighty used to be regarded by them as a premature decease, and they still have a remarkable proportion of active riding as soap, can their white skin and fine European features be discerned. Otherwise what can be seen of them, beside part of their aquiline noses and their blue, grey, or brown eyes, makes them look like quaint blueskins, for they heavily tattoo arms and hands and other parts of their person. They call themselves Imochagh, and are only called Tuareg, with Tarqui as singular form, by their Arab foes. "Tuareg" means apostates, and they are nicknamed thus because they abandoned Islam out of hate for the invading, land-grabbing Arab.

FRANCE: COLONIAL EMPIRE

Their women, as becomes a wild, free, white race, are among the freest in the world. If possible they go with their men into battle. They can ride a dromedary sixty miles in an afternoon for pure pleasure. They, however, have a more graceful walk than the men, who generally look strange and awkward on their feet, as they mount their racing camels from childhood, and do not like to dismount unless it is to stretch themselves for a rest. Primitive mother right is the base of the Imochagh woman's freedom. She retains in full all the privileges of the female Berber. If she welcomes a stranger, the tribe must use him as a guest of honour. If her husband has conversation with a slave girl, she makes the offspring family serfs, while if her daughter were so lost to pride of race as to marry a half-breed, her children would be free and noble. But seldom does a Berber girl stoop in this way. She belongs to one of the proudest fighting aristocracies, and round the black camel-skin tents of her family

PORCUPINE QUILLS AS AN AID TO BEAUTY

The women of French Equatorial Africa usually adopt scanty draperies of a decorative pattern, but the tribal ornaments are numerous and original in the extreme, porcupine quills inserted in the nose being the very acme of fashion centenarians. They and their women dress in the blue cotton woven by settled Berbers of Wad Nun on the Atlantic coast of Morocco.

The men, however, are remarkable for their custom of masking their faces in a long cloth. They do not remove it before going to sleep, and only when they wash themselves, with sand serving

BLACK JUSTICE MOVES WITH MEASURED TREAD IN SENEGAL

In the chief town of every province of French West Africa there is a native court of justice composed of the chief of the province, with two of the notables to assist him. These native judges preserve great dignity, and conduct their sessions with leisurely solemnity, and there is a patriarchal atmosphere about their courts, which frequently sit in the open air under immense cotton trees

Photo, Fortier

DESERT DIGNITY ARRIVES ON CAMELS AT TIMBUKTU

Pastoral nomads of the Sahara, the Tuaregs are Islamised people of Berber stock, with many good qualities and distinctive institutions. Many of them are excellent craftsmen in metal and leather work, hand pottery, and weaving. This photograph shows a company of petty Tuareg chiefs arriving at Timbuktu to have a palaver with the French authorities and to make a few purchases there may be scores of tents of half-breed or black retainers. The women often control the money and are renowned for their virtue.

INSEPARABLE COMPANIONS

A warrior born and bred, the Congolese native would rather dispense with his few personal adornments than with the trusty spear, his friend from early manhood.

In Mauritania, the most dangerous country in the world for an explorer to enter, the life of the Berber exists in fullest variety. On the northern side, with water and good soil, the Kabyles live in confederations of fighting villages. The name "Kabyle" means, as in Algeria, a member of settled tribes that are leagued for defence. The people grow barley, weave blue cotton, and make the silver jewelry that jingles on every free Berber woman. Each village is governed by a freeman's council, and divided into two opposing parties led by chiefs. Feuds between confederates are usually settled, because there is a state of permanent warfare between Berber and Arab settlements. Then by the villages of stone or clay and straw built houses and walls there is often a camping place for the tents of nomad Berber shepherds, who wander over the desert pastures, mounted on dromedaries and armed against lions, leopards, and persons who dispute their right to feed their sheep.

There are, however, peaceful market places for Arab and Berber, such as the large walled, towered, and five-gated town of Augilmin in Wad Nun, where the Jews do most of the work as well as a good deal of the trading, and have a couple of synagogues and a school near the mosque and great square. There is also open trade in the oasis town of Tenduf, at the inland end of the Tekna region by the old trading route from Timbuktu to Morocco.

Amid the wastes below Tenduf are gum forests and famous salt pits on which the Niger country depends for salt. The French Government still has to allow caravans to go into Mauritania to trade for salt, and the Spanish occupation of the Rio de Oro province of Mauritania is at present so light and weak that the free tribes are recovering their market in European goods, which they lost in French Morocco and French Sahara.

Picturesque as is the broken and fugitive Berber lord of the great desert, his defeat was a blessing to all his subjects. His rival, the Arab, is dying out through luxury and viciousness, and though, from a military point of view, the puritanic virtue of the Berber that has enabled him to survive all disasters and out-breed all conquerors may be deplored, the perennial strength of his stock, when it is finally broken to civilization, will be a blessing. For his vast lost empire needs him again, trained and intellectual, as foreman. French engineers are already transforming his old dominion. In some places they are finding water only fifteen feet below the sand. They are turning many a brackish well, with a single clump of palm trees, into an irrigation village, with a square mile of date palms and orchard trees.

FRANCE: COLONIAL EMPIRE

At Tougourt a system of desert railways begins, with feeding motor tracks that will make the Sahara, when irrigated and supplied with power from solar steam plants, capable of supporting a large population. Far from being a flat, sandy wilderness, the Sahara, a million square miles in extent, is a rolling country, with mountains going up eight thousand feet into the blazing sky, with rainy highlands like Adrar, Air, Borku, and Tibesti, and a soil consisting mainly of gypsum, chalk, and sand, that needs only water to make it wonderfully fertile. Above Cape Juby, where there was a British colony until 1896, there is an example of a waste that could feed some millions of people.

Enormous quantities of water from the Atlas run to waste for lack of reservoirs and conduits. As a thrifty Scot of the old Juby settlement pointed out, with voice breaking at the thought of what was being wasted, twenty thousand Berbers and Arabs fight for food in a region that could maintain all Scotland. This is the kind of thing that the French are remedying, but they need enlightened white Berbers, rather than the patient, unprogressive old black slaves of the Berber, to help them in their work.

The trouble is that the nomad Berber has filled nearly all the best parts of his old dominions with varieties of half-breeds. He peopled oases and permanent pastures with dusky serfs, who are now breeding from the southern slopes of the Atlas to the Upper Volta territory in the curve of the Niger River, and from Mauritania to the frontier of the Nile Basin. Below Algeria, where the oases are thickset with his mulattoes, his old slave races of blacker blood begin to prevail at Wargla and extend to Lake Chad and the black kingdom of Wadai.

More useful is the race-making work of the Berber in Western Sudan. His mongrel nations are the progressive forces in a vast territory that was

TO SPEED THE COMING GUEST

A hearty welcome awaits visitors to this Congo village in the shape of a deafening tattoo which the old negro minstrel beats on his most remarkable instrument

Photo, Underwood Press Service

HEREDITARY FOES MINGLING IN FRIENDLY CONCOURSE IN THE MARKET PLACE OF THE CITY OF TIMBUKTU

The old city of Timbuktu on the edge of the Sahara Desert, eight miles north of the river Niger, is the rendezvous of the different tribes of natives who follow the trade routes across the vast wastes that border it. Tuaregs, Berbers, Dagas, and many other tribes come to the dirty, mud-built city to trade their wares and transact other business. Although Timbuktu has at times possessed a very large population, it now musters only some four thousand inhabitants

photo, Fortier

settled by dull-minded forest blacks. Deadly fevers still protect many negroes of the low type. In the forest of the Ivory Coast, voodoo snake worshippers still hold their terrible rites. Free Liberia, with a veneer of culture along her shore, spreads tribes with strange, dark ways across her back lands into French territory, and Dahomey, to which a separate chapter is devoted, though opened by railway, remains pagan-minded. But close behind the worst of the pagan tribes press the warlike Berber half-breeds, most of them strong in the faith of Islam. Such are the Fulanis, of the French Guinea uplands, a stock of fair-skinned fighting men, who have violently bettered many black tribes, from the Senegalese to the Hausa, and also produced the Berber-negro Mandingo stock, who are smiths, weavers, dyers, and leather-makers, and fanatic Moslems, busy converting the pagans behind Liberia and in the Upper Volta. One virtue of the numerous Moslem half-breeds is that the law of the Prophet saves them from both trade gin and native intoxicants. So they outlive the pagans, and console themselves with the kola nut, that stimulates better than tea, coffee, or cocoa, and is growing in value as a French colonial article of commerce in Europe.

Senegal is the favourite French colony in Western Africa, just as the black Senegalese troops are the favourites of the French public. Much of the golden traffic of the desert, which the nomad Berbers used to send towards the Mediterranean, now comes by caravan and river steamer down to St. Louis at

SONS OF THE SAHARA UNDER FRENCH RULE

The ancient town of Timbuktu is a converging point for the chief races of Central Africa; and Moor and Tuareg are not infrequently seen walking arm-in-arm in warm-hearted fraternity within and without its walls the mouth of the Senegal. Up this river a railway connects with the waterway of the Niger, ready to take the trade of Timbuktu, when there is any. The French also base on Senegal the scheme of a railway system which they expect to give them, among other things, a control of trade with South America.

Rare are the harbours along the West African coast; but at Dakar, on Cape Verde, in Senegal, is a fine naval and commercial port, with concrete wharves, and cranes for lifting cargoes from and to holds of ships and trucks awaiting trains. Dakar is less than fifteen

FRANCE: COLONIAL EMPIRE

SUDANESE GRACE

Since childhood she has been taught to respect the flag of France, and the camera—that strange innovation of the white man—excites her curiosity rather than her fear thousand miles from Pernambuco, in Brazil. It is intended as soon as possible to bring South America a week nearer Europe by the construction of a line running from Dakar to Fez and Tangier. Another line is in course of construction from Algeria to Lake Chad. And in French Guinea a railway runs hundreds of miles into blank jungle towards the Nigeria frontier.

It used to be said in Africa that the British first construct a Customs House, the Teutons a barracks, and the Frenchmen a railway. The Gauls certainly believe in creating commerce instead of waiting for it, but hitherto they have not been very enterprising in the business development of their Guinea Coast territories. Their planters and prospectors for minerals seem slow to follow their railways. Only the earth nut of Senegal is largely produced for European trade, and with some thousands of tons of palm oil and rubber, represents, according to a recent French

DAUGHTER OF A GREAT AFRICAN NATION

The elaborate headdresses of the women of the proud Fulah race in French Sudan prove them to be as ardent devotees of fashion as their cultured white sisters who dwell in the gay capital of the far-away European foster-country authority, the full prosperity of the Black Indies of France.

The fact is that round her ancient settlement of Senegal, France has only staked out the domain she intends to develop. So it is in regard to her principal negro territory of Equatorial Africa, which stretches from Gabun and the Congo to Lake Chad, and, with the French Cameroon, has an area of more than one million square miles, with a population of perhaps nine million souls. For the most part this is wild land with primitive folk, who live in a steam bath, amid rotting vegetation, under a killing sun. The country is formed of great tablelands, rising one behind each other, like a gigantic staircase, each step being from six hundred to nine hundred feet higher than the one below it.

On the coast level are great delta swamps, where the mangrove darkens leagues of pestilent ooze. Above this the rivers spread out in immense sheets of almost stagnant water. Then come the rapids and falls from the first tableland, in which the rivers have scooped out great shallow basins, where they spread in sombre grandeur in the pitiless glare of the sun. With the soil brought down from the highest terraces near the Chad country, the basins of the immense tributaries of the Congo grow into inland deltas of swamp.

Here little solid earth is left for man, and the mosquito, breeding continually in the heat and water, fills the air with its deadly music. Villages are built upon the few banks of earth which are not submerged in floods, and in some regions the tribes have to construct the mounds on which they live, and canoe to their neighbours' huts. Above this tableland, where the Congo tributaries spread, there is an unflooded plateau with good ground, and above this rises the sand waste of the final tableland, that has become too dry to retain its former forests.

HANDSOME IS AS HANDSOME DOES

Good looks are of no avail for the men of the Cameroon tribes; deeds of prowess alone can attract feminine favours. Nevertheless, the carefully-arranged coiffure of this native of Bana bespeaks more than a suspicion of personal vanity

Photo, Brown Bros.

Such in perspective is the trying and very uncomfortable territory of French Equatorial Africa. It contains a few wandering families of pygmies in its wildest, gloomiest forests. They have long since been overborne and outbred

GLIMPSE OF THE NATIVE QUARTERS IN JIBUTI, THE CHIEF TOWN AND SEAPORT OF FRENCH SOMALILAND
 The importance of the colony is undoubtedly due to Jibuti, the seat of administration, with its fine harbour and railway line which penetrates to Addis Abbaba, the capital of Abyssinia. Trade is the chief occupation both in the European and in the native quarters ; aromatic spices are among the chief products of the country, for Somaliland still remains the " Regio Aromatifera " of the ancients, supplying the world with considerable quantities of myrril, frankincense, and balsams by a variety of negroes and Bantus, some small like the Balali, some very tall like the Atyo, some with fine intelligent features like the Basundi, others an ugly incarnation of brute force, like the Central Ubangi tribesmen. General kinship is shown by flat noses and gaping nostrils, thick lips, prominent cheek-bones, and a chocolate-coloured skin that never deepens into black.

Circumstances have divided this type of humanity into two classes—the men of the woods and the men of the plains. The wood negro lives in dense, dim, silent forests, where the paths between the great trees are choked with brushwood or blocked by the roots, boles, and branches of fallen timber. Except for the cawing of a few toucans and rustle of monkeys high in the roof of leaves, there is silence, and all the green twilight is thick with moist heat.

Here dwells the crafty, fierce, forest negro, bound by gloomy suspicions and bad-tempered, to whom the getting of food is often long, heavy labour. On the other hand, the man of the plains, living under the open sky, with food growing almost within reach of his hand, is of an open, merry nature, trustful and almost honest. His chief fault is that life comes so easy to him that he is incurably indolent. Northward he becomes gradually blended with blacks, who have been influenced by the Berbers, and it is said that the most remarkable of the Berber half-breeds, the Fulani, drove some of the fiercest of the blacks, such as the Fans, into the forests. The extraordinary medley of tribes forbids any detailed

BRIGHT GIRLHOOD AND UNATTRACTIVE OLD AGE

The average Somali woman is not handsome. Her good looks, undeniable in childhood, wane rapidly in adult life, whereas the charm of the young girls is always apparent in the flashing beauty of their eyes, their white teeth, and their bright, intelligent features description. For perhaps two thousand years, when the Romans interfered with the Mauritania Berber and induced more of them to take to desert life, the blacks of the Northern Congo tributaries have been harried by Berber half-breeds, the last of whom were the Moslem Sudanese stocks that slave-hunted for the Imochaghs. Many of the northern tribes of French Equatorial Africa have not yet been studied.

Regarding all the new equatorial subjects of France, it may be remarked that few have risen above cannibalism. Some practise it as a last revenge upon an enemy, while others buy slaves, fatten them and make their flesh tender, for sheer pleasure in the eating of this kind of meat. On the Lower Ubangi, the captain of a French steamer put in at a village to buy wood, and recognized on the bank a native who had been his steersman. The negro said he was a old kingdoms of Kanem, Bagirmi, Wadai, and Tibesti. Here, mingled with Arab invaders from the Red Sea and blacks, we meet again the masked Berber in three varieties of Imochagh, Fulani, and Tebbu, Teba or Tibbu. The Fulani, who are also known as Fulah, Fuolah, and Fulbe, are the stock that is spread from the Guinea uplands to the eastern Wadai border, as well as into British Nigeria and Darfur. They are one of the world's great fighting races, but many of them are so mixed with negro tribes that the nation shades from white to at least reddish chocolate tints. Above them, in the Tibesti uplands and Borku hills, is the purer race of the Tebbu, who are light bronze in colour, with fine features like the Imochagh or Tuareg, masked like them, and of a pastoral way of life. Having for ages to defend the finest pastures in the Sahara against foes from all sides, the Tebbu are distrustful of strangers, and little as yet is known of their history. Westward they have thrown off from negroid serfs a darker strain in the Kanembu, and another branch settled at Kauar oasis on the route from Bornu to Tripoli.

FRANCE : COLONIAL EMPIRE

AGED BEAU BRUMMEL OF CAMEROON

Albeit his venerable head is destitute of hair, the deficiency is covered to a nicety by the tight-fitting cap which, massed with quaint ornaments, is one of the distinctive headdresses of the natives of Fumban

Photo, Brown Bros.

prisoner of the cannibals, and the captain offered to carry him off. The man had only to leap to the bridge of the ship, while the crew covered the villagers with their guns and the boat steamed off at full speed. But the victim refused to be rescued, because he was enjoying all the luxuries of life in comparative freedom, and the prospect of his end did not trouble him.

Above the negro and Bantu regions of French Equatorial Africa is the more romantic territory of Chad, with the

Having followed the wandering Berbers from the Western to the Eastern Sudan, we must now change guides, and take the course of General Marchand and his half company of Senegalese troops when, in 1898, they marched from the French African border, by way of Fashoda, to Jibuti on the Red Sea. It was the Jibuti railway to Abyssinia that led to the scheme of the Marchand expedition, which, with the aid of an Abyssinian army on the Nile, was to have extended

NATIVE OF THE DUALA DISTRICT PRACTISING HIS TRADE

He manifests his artistic genius in executing carvings in wood, and, living in the vicinity of the European factories and missionary stations, has no lack of white customers for his wares. The Duala natives, together with their Bakwiri neighbours, are the best known of the Cameroon tribes. Typical Bantus, they take pride in their racial purity, and until recently regarded all half-castes as a disgrace

Photo, J. R. Birtwistle

NEGRO MUSIC-MAKERS SEARCHING FOR ELUSIVE MELODIES

Most of the tribes of Equatorial Africa are devoted to music, and many are the strange devices which come under their category of musical instruments. These natives of French Cameroon have apparently expended much imagination upon their inventions, but, judging from the somewhat pathetic expressions on their faces, the weird noises produced are not altogether satisfactory

Photo, Brown Bros.

DUSKY BRIDES OF NATIVE MILITIAMEN WHO GUARD THE FRENCH TERRITORY IN GUINEA

The unusual experience of facing the camera has rendered these native women of French Guinea unusually self-conscious. Their normal dress is far more scanty than that which they are now wearing in honour of a special fête organized by the French officials at their home in Labé, a town in the province of Futa Jalon, in the west of French Guinea. In their brightly-coloured voluminous robes, with heavy bead ornaments on their heads and necks, the women are conscious of being clad in a way that will be fully appreciated by their soldier husbands the French African empire from the Atlantic Ocean to the Red Sea. In those days the only vegetation in French Somaliland was said to consist of three palms by the Jibuti hotel, which were made of painted tin. Things have improved since then.

FRANCE: COLONIAL EMPIRE

French Somaliland still has one of the dearest of political railways, on which the fare to Diré-Dawah used to amount, before the war, to about a shilling a mile. But the land is no longer a desiccated, monotonous stretch of bleak tropic coast, with dry torrent beds behind, down which unexpectedly roar ruining floods. A large underground lake of fresh water has been found, and is used to fertilise a soil on which fine crops are grown. With the desert beginning to blossom with hot-house luxuriance, and trade with southern Abyssinia increasing to £3,000,000 a year, the land of hopes that were lost at Fashoda is prospering in a steady, moderate way.

Less happy is the fairy-like island of Réunion, or Bourbon, rising off Africa, and regarded by the French as a source of colonists for Madagascar. It is a great volcanic peak, 970 miles square at sea level, surmounted by two high craters, Piton des Neiges and Piton de la Fournaise, that gather snow and rain and send the waters down thousands of picturesque gorges into torrent rivers. There is a wonderful variety of climate from the warm coastland to the snowy Piton and the fiery Fournaise that is active and sometimes rolls its lava into the ocean.

Little more than a six-mile belt of mouldered fertile lava round the shore is peopled, and in the moist, hot air flowers and foliage grow with such lovely fury of life that the humblest garden looks like a corner of Eden and threatens to overwhelm the poor native hut. On the heights the scenery is wildly grand, with vast amphitheatres and chaoses of rock, that go down dappled with emerald forests and purpling heather to chill pastures, amid which some ancient Breton

BEAUTY JUDGED BY FANCY HEADRESS

Among certain tribes of French Congo a woman's beauty is judged by the manner in which her hair is dressed. Undoubtedly, the owner of this fantastic coiffure stands a good chance of being awarded the coveted apple by some dark-skinned Paris families still dwell. Unfortunately, the French settlers are diminishing. At the capital of St. Denis, among some 24,000 townsmen, there is said to be only a score of old families of pure white strain. The population has grown into mulatto stock, with some negroes, Malagasies, Hindus, and Chinese. The half-breeds, with their chocolate or café-au-lait complexions, number about 160,000, and are officially known as Europeans. Politics is their passion and work their aversion. They are also excessively fond of rum,

Photo, Kadel & Herbert

FEMALE DIRECTORS OF THE DYE INDUSTRY

Vegetable dyes are in much request in West Africa, where special attention is given to their preparation. In this town of Kankan in French Guinea the dye-works are under female supervision. Native women also take active parts in the dye industry of Sierra Leone, and on page 734 the common dye-pots of a town may be seen in a specially-constructed cage guarded by a female policeman

WHERE NECESSITY IS THE MOTHER OF INVENTION

How strangely this simple, improvised loom of the French Guinea natives compares with the complicated mechanism of the looms of the more civilized world! But Time, the arch-enemy of the busy European nations, is of no account to the natives of West Africa, and this young negro lad contentedly plies the shuttle without so much as a grumble at his lengthy and laborious task and, when young and ambitious, can usually be induced to do enough light work to earn the money for a frock coat and patent leather boots, so as to make themselves gentlemen on feast days and Sundays. They are one of the most worthless folk in a land that is purely agricultural. In spite of the richness of the soil, they cannot raise enough meat or grain for themselves, and, except during the wartime prosperity of the sugar plantations, mainly worked by imported labour, there are usually more imports than exports. Réunion at present is a mulatto-lost paradise.

E. W.

2. Fisherfolk of the American Islands

FRENCH America is like a sunken continent, showing only its scattered mountain peaks in the form of lonely isles in a disastrous sea. Once it promised to rival Spanish America, and down to the Mexican Expedition of the Third Napoleon, France had hopes of an American empire. All her present possessions consist of a couple of isles and some rocks off Newfoundland, two sizeable volcanic islands in the Caribbean Sea, and a patch of tropic wilderness in Guiana. The total import and export commerce of these possessions amounts to little more than £5,000,000 a year.

The fisherfolk of Saint Pierre and the Miquelons, by Newfoundland, are the only settled white population. They number about 4,500 people, most of whom live on the ten square miles of barren granite which is Saint Pierre. The two Miquelons, which are larger and have stretches of arable soil, support only some four hundred poor, hardy peasant fishers, who are never certain whether the tongue of land connecting Great and Little Miquelon will not disappear. The islanders are mainly of Breton and Norman stock, but hardened into primitive ways by centuries of struggle against adverse conditions.

Declining Importance of Saint Pierre

Saint Pierre attracts the little mass of the population by having the only good roadstead, sheltered by the Isle of Dogs, with a fishing bank within ten hours' sail. Along the port, at the foot of a mountain, stretches the small stone and timber-built town, with its large wooden quays, beyond which are the drying strands on which an enormous quantity of codfish used to be prepared for export. Twenty years ago the scene in the fishing season was one multitudinous bustle. From Brittany and Normandy came large fishing fleets, which, with the islanders' vessels, numbered more than one thousand ships that worked over the great banks.

Winter Terrors on the Banks

The little isles then ranked, from the commercial point of view, as the third most important oversea possessions of France. They produced an annual revenue superior to that of many French departments, and the movement of navigation was larger than that of most French seaports. The fisheries have declined through lack of herring bait and restriction of grounds.

The people have to stand a winter beginning in late October and lasting often until June. It is exceedingly cold, and at times a ring of ice encloses the islands, and prevents all communication with the outer world until it breaks up in spring-time. North-easterly winds come in furious tempests, and, with powdery mountain snow, penetrate into the poor wooden cabins, and make it impossible to see out of doors so that even short journeys are perilous. The ice-dust can choke a man, besides preventing him from seeing. When the snow dunes melt and summer comes with a stride, the heat and south-easterly winds bring spells of fog, covering earth and sea usually for ten or twelve days. There is also a spring-time procession of southing icebergs to add to the terrors of the sea.

FRANCE: COLONIAL EMPIRE

COMELINESS AND COLOUR IN A FRENCH COLONY

The native woman of Martinique revels in gaudy colours. The cut of her dress may be simple, but the material must be bright, and should it not be sufficiently striking a variegated shawl is worn around the shoulders

There is incomparably more picturesque and living romance in the West Indian colonies of Guadeloupe and Martinique. Yet these highlands of tropic beauty, bathed in cooling breezes, are as perilous as the icebound, fog-blanketed rock of wintry Saint Pierre. Guadeloupe, which consists of two islands with some thirty yards of sea between them, has an active volcano, La Soufrière. She lifts her menacing plume of smoke nearly a mile above the ocean amid a brilliant hill-country of forests and cascading streams. Slight but frequent earthquakes make the two lands sway like ships at anchor. Most buildings are, therefore, constructed of timber, but this only exposes the folk to another peril. For in the rainy season there are ravaging cyclones, sometimes of tremendous violence, that tumble the wooden towns about, and fling the sea upon the land.

Martinique is still wilder in her loveliness than Guadeloupe. Above her undulating, neglected, tangled woodlands rise six great volcanoes. The highest of them is the terrible Mont Pelée, which in 1902 proved to be one of the most devastating forces in the world. In a tremendous eruption it overwhelmed the largest town on the island, Saint Pierre, in which only one man, an imprisoned black murderer, escaped in his cell from the death blast and the lava streams. One-fifth of the total population of the island was annihilated, and only now are the people growing back to their former number of some two hundred thousand souls. The centre of commerce has moved westward to the old capital of Fort de France, with its rows of timber-built houses, framed in verdure and set in a magnificent bay. This town has suffered from serious conflagrations, and, as the larger group of old French business families perished with Saint Pierre, the island has had a hard struggle to maintain her fallen trade. Both Martinique and Guadeloupe are cane-sugar plantation colonies; which somewhat revived during the Great War when sugar was scarce and dear.

There are only a few thousand white men in the islands, and a considerable proportion of them are migrants of the

MULATTO WORKERS ON A MARTINIQUE SUGAR PLANTATION

Among the heterogeneous mixture of Martinique natives, white, black, and Carib, the mulattoes take a prominent place where good looks are concerned. On the sugar plantations many lovely types of mulatto women may be seen, whose graceful carriage, piquant air, and brilliant costumes, which afford "beautiful audacities of colour contrasts," are in excellent keeping with the vegetation official class. The bulk of the population are aged plantation slaves and their offspring, with tints of colour ranging from dull copper to the pure black. The vanished cannibal Carib, who would rather fight his white masters than work for them, interbred with the tamer negro race, and this has been turned into a mulatto shade by successions of white settlers. Then from Asia have been imported free Chinese and Hindu labourers, who have introduced new blends of blood among the liberated slave stock.

FRANCE: COLONIAL EMPIRE

The settled coloured folk vainly fought for their freedom in the first part of the nineteenth century, and were liberated in 1848. They have scarcely fulfilled the hope that freedom would inspire them with more energy, and the sugar industry survived only by organization into grand factories and the employment of imported Asiatic labour. Great is the natural wealth of the two large islands and the small isles, that have a total area of more than one thousand square miles. Yet the large forests, containing valuable woods, are but little worked, and a very considerable part of the fine soil is neglected, while the towns are overcrowded with indolent half-breeds.

There are no railways, but with abundant mineral oil close at hand,

QUIET CORNER OF AN IMPORTANT FRENCH POSSESSION

Fort de France, the capital of Martinique, the most picturesque island of the Caribbees, is the chief French naval station in the West Indies. It is situated a few miles to the south of Saint Pierre, the ill-fated town which in 1902 was destroyed in a few minutes by a terrible eruption of the volcanic Mont Pelée, when one-fifth of the population of the island was annihilated

NÈGRÈSS TRADERS BARGAINING IN THE MARKET PLACE

The southernmost island of the Leeward group, Martinique specially endears itself to France as the birthplace of the Empress Josephine; and here, too, Madame de Maintenon, another famous figure in French history, passed most of her early youth. A variety of colour and type prevails among the present-day native islanders. Negroes predominate, but half-breeds—mulattoes, Copres, Chabins, Matès—form a large proportion of the population motor traction on extended road systems could open up the main territories, if only the mulattoes would drink less cheap rum and work steadily either on the large estates or on small farms of their own. If they had been left to themselves, as were their former fellow-colonists of lost French Haiti, they would have descended to the same level as the free black republicans reached; indeed, they do not seem to have climbed very high under the easy democratic system of France.

The French West Indies also resemble the great island of the blacks, as it was before the Americans intervened, in regard to the restriction of commerce by aggravating customs dues. Altogether the islands rank among the most neglected domains of France, but they possess, in the chaos of rocks known as the Archipelago of the Saints, a natural fortress of remarkable strategic value, the Gibraltar of the Antilles, near to the European lines of traffic to the Panamá Canal.

Still more neglected than the French West Indies is the domain of 32,000 square miles of French South America. This is the Guiana colony, equal in size to one-third of France, with a white population consisting chiefly of officials. The notorious penal settlement near the capital, Cayenne, with its remote outpost of Devil's Isle, on which Captain Dreyfus was kept in solitary confinement, was for long the only point of remarkable interest.

It is a difficult, torrid country, in which thousands of French emigrants and convicts have perished. From a sandbanked, unindented coast stretches a muddy plain, from ten to twenty-five miles broad, and of luxuriant fertility. Upon it is washed the soil of neighbouring hills, under winter rains lasting for half the year, with the enormous volume of some 150 inches. Beyond the great marsh, all river passages are blocked by the cascading waters of the wild hill country, which rises in three tiers to the great inland plateau with

LICENSED COLOURED CONVICTS AND THEIR WIVES IN A PENAL SETTLEMENT AT APPROUAGUE, FRENCH GUIANA

To French ears, the name Guiana, or, rather, Cayenne, the common name for the whole colony, has many gloomy associations. During the French Revolution it received the sinister sobriquet of "the dry guillotine," such a large number of political prisoners having been banished there. Regular penal colonies were established about 1855 for habitual criminals and convicts sentenced to hard labour. At present, the population is almost exclusively composed of coloured convicts, including its border range of uncharted mountains. Besides jaguars, boa constrictors, caymans, varieties of deadly snakes and armies of merciless ants, one of the curiosities of the country is a man-eating fly. It lays its eggs in the nostrils of sleeping men, and the gnawing larva kills by producing inflammation reaching the membranes of the brain. Some of the highland dwellers appear no better than fly or snake.

Arabs, Indo-Chinese, negroes, and other offenders from the French colonies

FRANCE: COLONIAL EMPIRE

Before the liberation of slaves by the Second French Republic there were important and prospering plantations on the steaming coastlands, but when freed and blessed with a vote the negroes refused to work for wages. The buildings fell into ruins, which the tropic vegetation quickly covered. Many of the blacks took to the high woods and returned to savagery, mingling their African superstitions with Red Indian practices, and forming a kind of witch-doctor confederation under a chief known as the "Great Man."

They escaped the marsh fever, the yellow fever, and other maladies of the coastland, and being more than compensated for their new losses, including human sacrifices, they may have grown into a population of possibly ten thousand. This was also an old estimate of the number of the redskin tribesmen of the backlands, whom the Jesuits reduced to order before their own society was dissolved.

In 1854, after the liberation of slaves, an Indian brought news that he had discovered gold while gathering sarsaparilla on the banks of the Upper Approuague. The gold fever that then swept the coast was more fatal than all other diseases. Every able-bodied man, white or black, abandoned his trade, and went down the unexplored river or prospected in wilder directions. Some placer gold was found, but the few men who made anything like a fortune won their money by organizing trains of

WOMAN OF THE PEOPLE IN MARTINIQUE

Although a full-blooded negress she is undeniably "chic," a fact due perhaps to association with French colonists and to the vivid colouring of her costume which is so becoming to her dusky skin.

porters to carry food at famine prices to such miners as, having struck a pocket, could afford to buy bad provisions. Most of the adventurers died, and, in spite of attempts at quartz-mining, the output of gold has fallen to ten million francs a year, while exports of cocoa and coffee amount only to 17,700 francs. As for cayenne pepper, it is now only a commercial expression, unconnected with poor, miserable, fever-stricken Cayenne.

French Guiana is still a land of black and red savages, which the mining

DUSKY BELLE OF THE FRENCH WEST INDIES

A singularly strong individuality stamps the natives of Martinique. This finely-built young negress is a living justification of the eulogistic description of the island inhabitants given by Hearne, the English explorer: "Straight as palms, and supple and tall, these coloured women and men impress one powerfully by their dignified carriage and easy elegance of movement" prospector obscurely explores, and usually finds death. It is true he has found also diamonds and many other precious stones of less value, with silver, mercury, tin, copper, lead, and iron. The immense forests that climb over the three ranges of mountains are rich in rosewood and hardwoods, and produce oils, perfumes, dyes, and resinous gums.

Photo, Publishers' Photo Service

FRANCE: COLONIAL EMPIRE

But scarcely anything is done. At one time even hay had to be brought from Bordeaux to feed the horses of the small garrison. French Guiana is a land of old and modern tragedies, without development at present and without hope, but some day it will again attract the planter, now that tropic diseases are becoming controllable. E. W.

3. Subject Races in India & Indo-China

OF the vast territories that form the French Colonial Empire, French India, a link with the romantic days of Colbert and Dupleix, is curiously scattered. Its total area of about 196 square miles is divided between five colonies, four on the east and one on the west coast of the great peninsula, with a population of over 268,000, mostly Tamils, Telugus, Malayalams, Bengalis, and Gaurs.

Pondicherri, a low-lying, sandy, and alluvial region on the Coromandel coast, contains in its capital, Pondicherri, the seat of the governor of all French India. The town is divided into a European or White quarter, and a native, or Black quarter, separated by a canal. The colony is intersected by several rivers, including the Gingee, liable to inundations. There are many lagoons, one of which, the Lake of Oussoudou, has a superficial area of 20,000 acres. There is railway connexion with the South Indian system, and a good water supply, but no efficient drainage.

Capital of a Scattered Possession

The natives of Pondicherri, who are subject to cholera, marsh fevers, dysentery, diabetes, and elephantiasis, number about 166,000. They are for the most part Dravidian Tamils, and Sivaists in religion. The descendants of the original Portuguese settlers and native women are known as Topas, and differ only in dress from the Indians. The Tamils, among the most virile of the peoples of south India, possess a literature that flourished under the Jains between the ninth and the thirteenth centuries, and a language that has given to English such familiar words as cheroot, curry, and mulligatawny. Pondicherri and its village enclaves are surrounded by the British maritime district of South Arcot, famous as one of the great battlefields of India.

In the Garden of Southern India

Some ninety miles south of Pondicherri is Karikal, a rice-growing area, bordered by the British district of Tanjore, which is part of the "garden of southern India." It is a low-lying, fertile, and deltaic tract, extending over about fifty-three square miles. One of the most densely inhabited parts of Tanjore, it has a population of about 55,000, chiefly Tamils. Its principal town, also called Karikal, is a mile and a half from the mouth of the Arasalar river, is served by a railway from Paralam, and is a distributing centre for one of the great American oil combines.

In the British district of Godovari, named after one of the sacred rivers of India, is a small enclave called Yanaon or Yanam. Only some five square miles in area, Yanaon is a deltaic region, receiving water for irrigation purposes from a British canal, and the 5,000 Telugus who form the bulk of its inhabitants excel as farmers, make good seamen, and are distinguished by energy and enterprise.

The small colony of Chandernagore covers only about four square miles, lies on the Hooghli, twenty-two miles north of Calcutta, and, like Mahé, is remarkable for the relative salubrity of its climate. It is served by the East Indian Railway, but is debarred from

ART IN THE SERVICE OF RELIGION: THE PAGODA AT VILLENOUR

Pondicherri is not so rich in splendid temples as other towns of India, but this pagoda at Villenour is notable. Under a richly decorated hangar is kept a heavy car made of nicely adjusted square blocks of timber with carved representations of a Buddhist procession. On festivals this is drawn out in a procession by twelve to fifteen hundred men straining on a rope as thick as a huge python's body direct access to the sea. The 26,000 inhabitants are chiefly Bengalis, with a few Gaurs. The name of the Collège Duplex preserves that of Chandernagore's most celebrated administrator.

The last of the five "colonies" of French India is Mahé, on the west coast, within the British district of Malabar. Its twenty-six square miles include the capital, Mahé, on the left bank of the river of the same name, which is used as a coaling station, and the district of Nalutara on the opposite bank. The coconut palm grows here in great luxuriance. Of the 11,000 inhabitants the bulk are Malayalams, who speak a language allied to Tamil. A Mahomedan class is known as Maplais or Maplots, and there is a Sudra caste known as the Nayas.

Most of the natives of French India, all of whom enjoy liberty of religion and the rights of the franchise, are Hindus, the Mahomedans numbering about one-twentieth. Caste distinctions are maintained, but exhibit a tendency to modification under French rule. From the point of view of economic progress French India suffers from its geographical segregation, French and British territorial rights interlacing more intimately here than perhaps anywhere else in the world; but more than one French authority has declared that, if a good harbour were constructed at the mouth of the Ariancoupom, where it is protected by the Île des Cocotiers, Pondicherry would become one of the greatest commercial centres in India, successfully rivalling both Madras and Calcutta. Under the direction of the small force of French officials the natives have

LAOTIAN GIRL IN HER TEENS

Like most of her people she is inclined to be lazy and fond of gossip, but she is devoted to music and flowers. The silken scarf across her shoulder is her pride, and must match exactly the bright hue of the petticoat proved themselves in the main frugal, peaceable, patient, adaptable, and hard-working. Of the products, teak, sandalwood, aloe-wood, coconuts, bananas, pomegranates, mangoes, guavas, tamarinds, dates, oranges, citrons, areca nuts, ground nuts of the Arachis hypogaea, from which an almost indistinguishable substitute for olive oil is obtained, are of importance, as are rice, peas, lentils, vetches, betel, indigo, sugar-cane, gums, and spices. Cotton, sago, vanilla, cacao, and tobacco are cultivated. The crops in Mahé suffer from the inroads of the white ant. For nearly all transport purposes oxen are imported from British India. Irrigation methods in use are in many cases

MEMBERS OF A BLACK MEOS TRIBE WITH CHARACTERISTIC TRINKETS

Few jewels are worn by the members of the Meos tribes, which occupy several mountain heights in Laos and Tong-king. The women have long curved silver rods in their ears, the men a silver circlet round their necks. Despite the efforts of European travellers to purchase these trinkets, the Meos are loath to sell them, superstitiously fearing that death will speedily follow if they part from them

YOUNG COUPLE OF A WHITE MEOS TRIBE IN FULL DRESS

The Meos, a vigorous mountain race, are divided into several tribes which claim to be grouped into White Meos and Black Meos; this distinction, however, having no relation to colour of complexion or to style of dress. The full dress of the Meos woman is composed of a black turban, a pleated skirt, a bodice crossed in front, with a big sailor collar, and fastened by a sash as primitive as those illustrated in the chapters on Egypt. In addition to its cotton - spinning and weaving mills, Pondicherry possesses some indigo factories, iron works, foundries, oil-works, tanneries, brickworks, and a distillery for arrack.

FRANCE: COLONIAL EMPIRE

There are many native industries in Pondicherry and Karikal, including the and Cambodia have been described in earlier pages. Covering an area of 310,344 square miles, with a population estimated at nearly 17,000,000, of whom some 24,000 are Europeans, these French possessions are bounded north by China, west by Burma, Siam, and the Gulf of Siam, and east and south by the China Sea. There were French

PEACEFUL DESCENDANTS OF THE ANCIENT RULERS OF CHINA

Descendants of the people who once dominated Central China, the Miaos occupy the territory of Tong-king bordering the Chinese frontier. Although they practise the crudest forms of animism, and possess but little intellectual development, these people still bear traces in their customs and traditions of an ancient higher culture. They are fair, and possess wavy hair making of pottery, tortoiseshell, horn, and mother-of-pearl work, goldsmith's work, jewelry, mats, baskets, ropes, sailcloth, toys, soaps, silk and cotton loin-cloths, embroidery and lace.

French Indo-China consists of the Protectorates of Tong-king, Laos, Annam, and Cambodia, the colony of Cochin-China, and the leased Chinese territory of Kwangchow Wan. Annam missionaries in Tong-king in the seventeenth century, but the era of modern development in Indo-China began in the '60's of the nineteenth century.

The whole area is administered by a governor-general with the assistance since 1898 of a superior council, the seat of government since 1903 being Hanoi. The interior is covered by mountainous forests and jungles, and the

LOUD-VOICED GONGS THAT LEND INSPIRATION TO THE SWAYING NATIVE DANCERS OF LAOS

In strange contrast to the prosaic background provided by the white verandaed house is the wild Khas dance being enacted on the lawn in front. The Khas Knous, savage and untamed tribesmen of the Laos district, like most primitive people, give expression to their emotions in the dance. While the women, in bright skirts and their hair bound in high crowns on their heads, sway to the movements of the dance, the two men beat upon their native drums. The harsh, discordant notes excite the dancers and spur them on to greater efforts

WHERE YOUTH AND PLEASURE MEET TO BEGUILF THE GLOWING HOURS OF A LAOTIAN NOONTIDE

Laos has been amusingly termed the Kingdom of the Flirt, and, indeed, much of the time of the young men is spent in paying court to the Laotian girls. In the streets they may be seen walking and chatting gaily together, exchanging flowers and amorous compliments, and a favourite occupation is sitting in groups at the entrance to the pagodas, where they amuse themselves with recitations, singing, and playing on the quaintly-fashioned musical instruments of the country

NEW YEAR'S DAY IN LAOS: STATE PROCESSION OF THE KING OF THE LAND OF A THOUSAND ELEPHANTS

November 19 is New Year's Day in the Laotian calendar, and is a national festival, during which the King goes in state to worship at the pagoda of the That-Luong at Luang-Prabang. His Majesty, wearing his lofty crown, is borne by eight servants on a throne shaded by three large white silk umbrellas, emblems of the sovereign power, and followed by a train of men carrying fans of peacock feathers and palm-leaves. Way for the procession through the obsequious crowd is kept by two files of lictors, each carrying a large sword by the point, and hilt upwards.

NATIVE STUDENTS AT THE COLLEGE OF INTERPRETERS IN HANOI, THE GO-AHEAD FRENCH COLONIAL CAPITAL Hanoi, the chief town of Tong-king, has been the capital of Indo-China since 1903. It is a modern town, possessing an electric tram route and many other up-to-date institutions. It can also boast a fine university and a European College. The professors and students seen here belong to the College of Interpreters, which is designed to give natives a thorough training in the French language; the collegians live together, and at table follow European customs

PATIENT IN THE PURSUIT OF LEARNING

Education is far advanced in the Protectorate of Tong-king, where many schools have been established, and this fine old man, full three score years and ten, is the doyen of the students at the University Triennial Examinations hot, moist climate of the south is very trying for Europeans. Tong-king for Europeans is perhaps the healthiest area, especially in the winter. The maladies most prevalent are malaria, dysentery, cholera, and small-pox. The two most important river systems are those of the Mekong and the Red or Song Koi River, the former being subject to heavy floods and impeded by rapids, shoals, and shifting sandbanks.

At its mouth the Mekong forms an immense delta of alluvial and exceedingly fertile soil, and the delta of the Red River has similar advantages.

On one of the branches of the Red River is Haiphong, the biggest port in Tong-king. Besides exporting rice from the great Tong-kingese delta it is the only outlet to the sea for Yun-nan, the great southern province of China. During the three years I lived in Haiphong the town increased by one-third, and since 1910 it has had railway connexion with Yun-nan-fu, the capital of Yun-nan. Its big, two-storeyed houses and broad streets give it the appearance of a French town, but there are more Chinese than Tong-kingese shops and stalls. One only sees the natives at the market and in the suburbs. Men and women are dressed in drab-coloured clothes, the colour of their huts and roads, which is less picturesque than the blue of Annam.

Hanoi, on the contrary, is full of local colour, and has a cathedral, a university, a theatre, and a racecourse. There are numbers of native streets full of native wares, such as toys, sandals, cotton cloths, etc. ; and in the centre of the town is a little lake with native pagodas built on islets in its midst, and coloured in harmony with their surroundings. Under the trees overhanging the lake is a broad drive much affected by Europeans in the evening. But the most enjoyable excursion for Europeans in Tong-king is the world-famed Baie d'Along. Resembling the Inland Sea of Japan, it is a big bay whose water is always blue and seldom ruffled, and out of which spring thousands of islands of fantastic forms. Many are quite small, others large enough to have grottoes and caves that I have often explored. Richly endowed by nature and easily accessible, Indo-China has in times past offered great attractions to numerous powerful races. And here still are to be found Mois, Cambodians, Annamese, Chinese, Chams, Tai, Tos, Man, Meos, and Lolos. The Mois, as stated elsewhere in this work, have been driven back into the mountain fastnesses of Annam. The Cambodians are descendants of the Khmers who built the ancient town and palaces of Angkor and came originally from India. The Annamese, so populous that they may be said to hold the future of French Indo-China in their hands, are Mongolian in type, related to but differing from the Chinese in figure and character. They are small, slight, light-footed, versatile, and

FRANCE : COLONIAL EMPIRE

CAVALRY SOLDIERS OF TONG-KING ARMED WITH LANCES

Tong-king, which was brought under France's protectorate in 1884, has four military territories. Of the Annamese, who form the bulk of the native troops, a former Viceroy of India said: "Though not a courageous people in the sense of inviting or voluntarily meeting danger, they are very tenacious in resistance, and make capital soldiers against an Asiatic enemy" adaptable. Their keenest commercial rivals are the Chinese.

FRANCE : COLONIAL EMPIRE

The Chams, like the Cambodians of Hindu origin, after playing an important part in the history of Indo-China down to the middle of the fifteenth century, are now found only in isolated groups in the southern districts of Annam and in Choudac in Cochin-China. The Tai or Free Men came originally from the outskirts of Tibet, Yun-nan, and Burma. They founded the kingdoms of Luang-Prabang and Siam. The Man migrated from Fu-kien, the Meos from Kweichow, and the Lolos from

Sze-chuen. It is on Cochin-China that the French genius has set its own peculiar seal. They first occupied it in 1862, but its capital, Saigon, is full of animation, a great centre of trade, and an object lesson of the way in which the best of Western civilization may blend with and adapt itself to that of the ancient East. Its hotels and restaurants remind one of some of the most noted in Europe. Though forty miles from the sea it has a harbour of commercial and naval importance. The amenities include a magnificent opera house. On its outskirts, and connected with it by railway

TRIBUTE OF FLOWERS PAID BY SIMPLE FAITH

More numerous than shrines of the Blessed Virgin Mary in Roman Catholic countries are the images of Buddha in lands that have accepted his teaching. Here, in French Indo-China, four girls have gathered before one such image and, leaving their slippers outside the holy ground defined by the strip of matting, are laying offerings of fresh flowers at the feet of the unresponsive figure and electric trams, is the native town of Cholon, whose inhabitants are mostly Chinese. Cholon is a famous centre of the rice trade, and its huge granaries are equipped with every modern device.

Photo, F. Detaïlle

Rice is the staple food of the natives, its cultivation their chief occupation, and new methods of irrigation are extending the industry. Going from Haiphong to Hanoi by train the traveller finds rice fields stretching as far as the eye can see, the little hillocks that from time to time break the otherwise even surface being used as sites for pagodas.

Laos is thinly populated and but little developed, but possesses great timber forests. Kwangchow Wan has a bay which may be converted into a first-rate port. The existing port, Chekkom, has a good though undeveloped harbour. Kwangchow Wan lies at equal distance between Haiphong and Hong-kong, through which about one-fifth of the trade of Indo-China comes or goes. The surrounding country is believed to be rich in coal.

On the whole, no French colony is more progressive than Indo-China. Few, if any, are more contented. During the Great War it furnished some 200,000 men as well as money for the home country. Public works, including railways, harbour improvements, roads, irrigation, shipping, telegraphy, telephony are proceeding, together with improvement in methods of manufacture.

Indo-China is one of the richest rice fields of the world. Cotton is grown in Cochin-China, Cambodia, and Laos; tea in Tong-king and Annam. Rubber, which needs more capital for its full development, sugar-cane, coffee, ground nuts, beans, pepper, sesame, jute, indigo, tobacco, gums, camphor, cinnamon, fruits, vegetables, cardamoms, and areca nut are other products of the soil, while the fisheries provide an additional source of wealth. Anthracite coal, lignite, antimony, tin, wolfram, and zinc exist in abundance, but have not yet been properly exploited. Raw silk is produced, especially in Tong-king, where are thousands of acres of mulberry trees. Stock-raising offers large possibilities. Pigs and poultry are

ARCHERY IN THE WILDS OF THE ORIENT

The double-stringed bow is much in use among certain of the aboriginal races dwelling in the thick forests and labyrinthine highlands of French Indo-China, and there are tribes so primitive as still to use poisoned arrows

Photo, G. F. W. Elwes

TAHITI'S LONG PAST COMMEMORATED IN TRADITIONAL CHORIC DANCE AND ANTIPHON

Dramatic dances, in which women collected in one group interrogate men collected in another, are found among widely separated peoples. The Zulus' grand dances are such an accompaniment to tribal war and hunting songs, and here in Tahiti is an example of a traditional dance in which a choir of women sing chants to which a choir of men chants responses. The Tahitians have numerous folk-songs dealing with their national life, and also songs peculiar to specific trades, such as boat-building, woodcraft, and fishing, and on great festivals these are all sung and illustrated by dances reared everywhere. The wild buffalo of Laos has been domesticated for agricultural work, the zebu is used as a transport animal, and there is an indigenous breed of small but serviceable horses, bred largely in Tong-king and Cochin-China. The forested area is estimated at some sixty million acres, and much cut timber is floated down the Mekong to the saw-mills of Cambodia.

Photo, A. Aubertin

The industries include shipbuilding at Haiphong and Saigon, boat-building and motor works at Kan-tho in Cochin-China, silk-spinning and weaving, mat-making, pottery, paper-making, wood-carving, brewing, distilling, printing, the making of tobacco, matches, soap, buttons, and cement, and there are tanneries and dye works. Electric lighting and power stations are found in Haiphong, Hanoi, Saigon, and elsewhere.

There is a great national road that, starting from the Chinese border, runs across Tong-king, Annam, and across Cochin-China to the Siamese border of Cambodia; and motor roads, on the model of the routes nationales in France, traverse Cochin-China, part of Cambodia, and Tong-king. There is manifestly a great future for French Indo-China. The natives are prolific, hard-working, intelligent, eager to learn and excel, and their religion, with its spirit and ancestor worship, helps to keep them to the land and to family life.

G. M. V.

4. Island Communities in Australasia

THE Pacific seaway through the tropics to the fairy isles of the South Sea possessions of France is itself a glory. Days of splendid skies and resplendent seas, between which a mild, caressing trade wind blows, alternate with nights of strange milky stars, set in an immense lilac dome, over waters that break into enchanted fire and make a trail of radiance behind the ship. If you are lucky, and choose an errant wind-jammer, you will at last see an apparent mountain range shadowing out of the bluish mist. Then monstrous, fantastic needles of rock will rise against the skyline, and the apparent range of mountains will dissolve into five high volcanic islands, with a few islets neighbouring them. They are the Marquesas Isles.

Loveliness of Life Incarnate

It is not usual for a race of cannibals to be transformed into incarnations of the loveliness of life. But this happened to the Marquesans a considerable time ago. Their only trouble is that they lived too happily for many generations. Wild food grows so abundantly that they scarcely trouble to till the luxuriant soil of their valleys, and by the shore are such quantities of fish that catching them is merely a joyous sport.

Singing, dancing, and feasting in coronals of feathers and quaint head-dresses, with love-making of an extraordinary kind, are their old ways of life. They are among the farthest adventurers in the Pacific Ocean, of the romantic, primitive, Indo-European stock of white men, who fought their way from the Ganges valley down to Java, receiving a touch of Malay blood on the way, and then set out in their canoes to explore and settle the South Seas from Hawaii to New Zealand and the icefields of the Antarctic.

Serpents in the Garden of Eden

Where they have remained pure-blooded, as in some parts of the Marquesas Islands, they are of radiant physical beauty. But coarse whaling crews and other seamen bred with their women, and along the shore is still found a mob of European wastrels of the beachcombing sort, who take advantage of the extraordinarily free manners of the brilliant girls and the yet more extraordinary generosity of the native families, and live, like infecting parasites, upon one of the most wonderful of modern racés. The old banquet halls are tabooed, and so are the ghastly temples and the monstrous standing idols of the war-god and other deities. But the islands, with peaks towering three thousand and four thousand feet above the surge and thunder of the ocean, are mantled dare not; too often have they been broken. They are dying rapidly in a curious kind of race-suicide. Brooding despair slays them more than disease. They are probably the most nervous of all races. In an eclipse, men, women, and children die of fright, and a few nights in a solitary black prison cell may drive a man mad or kill him.

FRANCE: COLONIAL EMPIRE

Happy is the traveller if his copra-loading sailing ship leaves the port of Taiohae in the Marquesas, with its sombre people, its grandiose scenery of fantastic mountain walls, for the coconut plantations and mother-of-pearl fisheries of the Low Islands. Known also as the Paumotu Isles, or Taumotu Isles, they consist of some fourscore atolls, rings and reefs of coral, each with its calm sea-lake in the centre and groves of palms, scattered over a long, stormy stretch of tropic water in front of Tahiti. They form the second gateway to the earthly paradise of the South Seas. Of the same Polynesian or Maori stock as their neighbours, the Paumotu people have remained finer than the warlike Marquesans, and harder than the effeminate Tahitians. Their course of life and their need of training for long voyages in stormy waters have kept them athletic and adven-

MARQUESAN FASHION IN HATPINS

Under his healthy bronze beats a friendly and hospitable heart, but this native of the Marquesas is no saint, despite the suggestion of a halo round his head, given by the reeds that radiate from his fillet of shells with forest jungle, and laced with cascades, and, except for the wild boars' tracks, the wild highlands are blocked with tangled bush. Here many of the pagan ways of life are maintained, though what actually goes on, perhaps with aged men with tattooed faces in control, can only be guessed at.

Unlike their kinsmen, the Maoris, the Marquesans cannot forget and forgive. They would like to kill, but turous. The pure-blooded men are Greek bronzes, while the girls, with long black hair, exquisite bodies, fine faces, and superb dark eyes, are Astartes. There is an average of somewhat less than 500 men, women, and children on each forested atoll, and much of the old strange romance of life survives.

Connecting with the Low Islands is another very picturesque group, the Gambiers. They are six in number, and are arranged in a circle, with Gambier, or Mangareva, as the seat of government. The land area is only six square miles, with a few people, under a king and a remarkable number of nobles. But the people have been fairly civilized and educated in the course of three generations. They live under their own reformed laws, and all men over twenty-one years of age have political rights and elect their council, judges, schoolmasters, and policemen. They are a picturesque, contented little group of pearl fishers and mother-of-pearl gatherers, and make a good living.

Just south of them is the famous rocky refuge of the Bounty mutineers, Pitcairn Island, and westward is another sprinkle of French possessions—green Edens, set in foam-white upon a waste of waters washing down to the Antarctic. They are the Austral or Tubuai Islands, and the Rapa Islands—lonely, pleasant, tranquil refuges from the fear of civilization, with little tribes, nobles, possessing pedigrees of a thousand years, and kings of old romance, who have put off their supernatural powers but none of their dignity. South of them the nearest land is King Edward's Land in Antarctica; northward, among the Society Isles, is famous Tahiti.

Ever since the world of Europe was enraptured by Captain Cook's description of the life and scenery of Tahiti, this island of love and flowers, once peopled by the most beautiful of races, has been the earthly paradise for all men weary of civilization. Recently it has become the resort of honeymooning couples from America, and every globe trotter is divided in feeling between visiting Japan

HEBE OF THE SOUTH PACIFIC

Even judged by European standards, an undeniable beauty and charm may be attributed to the women of the Marquesas Islands, whose grace and symmetry of form would delight the sculptor and its geishas or steaming through the wonders of the South Seas to Tahiti.

There are, however, some disillusionments awaiting the wanderer to the New Cythera. Things have considerably changed since the days of Captain Cook. Even Pierre Loti's romance of Tahitian love, which is the standing modern advertisement of the sensuous joys of the island, is more a matter of decorative fiction than a picturesque statement of facts. It is Byronism in its last stage, when the mind creates the romance of passion for which it has vainly sought. Nevertheless, the wonders of the natural loveliness of the island remain.

When the voyager has passed the coral islands of Paumotu, with their brilliant beaches and palm-trees, and comes in from the sea in the enchanting air of early tropic morn, he sees Tahiti as a grandiose spectacle of vivid red

FESTIVE TAHITI TAKES KINDLY TO THE NEWFANGLED DRUM

Whatever private opinion the Tahitians may hold of French men and methods, they have unqualified approval for their drums, which are a vast improvement on their own crude percussion instruments. This young fellow sees no incongruity between the modern military drum introduced by his French rulers and the ornate festival dress gay with floral badges of his remote ancestors and green mountains, touched with basalt black, rising almost abruptly from the sea, forested and crowned with cloud. Westward the smaller island of Moorea lifts her peaks of weird shape above the open ocean, and offers a feast for the eyes that Tahiti herself cannot equal, or any other spot in the world.

Photo, A. Aubertin

FRANCE: COLONIAL EMPIRE

Tahiti, however, shows, as the light swiftly broadens, a singular union of qualities. Set against the grandiose effects of violet sea and emerald and scarlet mountains, to which clouds anchor at a height of nearly a mile and a half, are the exquisite, ineffable charms of valleys of paradise. They are divine gardens, languorous with intoxicating fragrances, wildly beautiful with flowers and fruit, with an atmosphere of voluptuousness, tempered by the freshness of mountain streams. But these delights are to come.

The voyager to the New Cythera has to submit to the traditional ordeal. When Captain Cook and his crews landed crowds of men and girls rushed upon them. At the little modern port of Papeete there is an excited mob of canoemen in the harbour, and on the quay a multitude of white men, half-breeds of both sexes and all tints, including a considerable proportion of Mongolised Tahitians and a few pure-blooded natives.

Those who wish to stay in Papeete rent native timber-built houses and native servants, and play at the simple life. It is best to leave the microscopic capital and wander, through the palm-groves and perfumed valleys, to the climbing tracks in the jungly brushwood of the mountain slopes with, if possible, a real Tahitian guide. Airy lodgings at night will be found in clean, leaf-roofed cabins. At worst, sleeping in the mild, sweet open air, under some fragrant tree, with breakers faintly rumbling on the reef far below and the night breeze shaking elfin music from leagues of leaves, is a pleasure no town can give.

If search be made in this primitive manner for old, real Tahiti, she is soon found. In the first place you will taste, taste with all your senses, the incomparable banquet of nature's pleasures,

ONE OF FRANCE'S OVERSEAS LIEGEMEN

The wild wooded crags of Mangareva, the largest islet of the Gambier group in the South Pacific, form a suitable setting for this picturesque personage with his enormous shock of long, fluffy hair and beautifully-beaded ornaments delicately arranged in the true gardens of the Hesperides. There are stretches of wild oranges, with large balls of gold, hanging in the green, perfumed twilight vaults of their thick foliage. The fruit is seedless and scented, melting in the mouth like a soft cream. Wild also grows the Indian herb, the banana of a deep bronze tint, which, when cooked on hot stones, is the favourite food of the people.

Tropical Luxuriance in Restraint

Magnificent mango-trees also seed themselves and flourish in the liana-tangled jungles, while the flowers that were born wild, or have run wild, from the glowing hibiscus blossom of the widespread tree and the yellow bloom of the bourao to the white stars of the tiare bush, are beyond enumeration. All the glories of the tropics blend and soften with the more delicate growths of the warm regions of the temperate zone. Save in some northern valley tracks that go in tunnels of foliage in a drowsy heat, by flower and leaf-hidden torrents that have lost their power to freshen the over-scented air, Tahiti is not rankly luxuriant. It is her special charm to conserve a kind of classic measure in her infinite varieties of natural beauties.

Refined and Generous Hospitality

And a kind of classic refinement marks her people of the genuine stock. You will find them on the mountain slopes, in lonely, pretty cabins, roofed with pandanus leaves, walled with liana-wattled lengths of tree boles and carpeted with dry herbage. Here one is in a land of inexhaustible hospitality.

Entering the airy, spacious, clean cabin, you will squat in Oriental fashion on a home-woven mat, and perhaps be adorned with flowers, to share the feast of fish, bread-tree fruit, baked bananas, and the beetroot-like taro. Then, in your honour, the most precious of dishes may be served—a tin of New Zealand corned beef! Or there may be some wild pigling. After the meal, the maiden will sing to you. You are the guest. The father will wear a gailycoloured loin-cloth and flowers, the wife and daughter long white tunics, collars of blossom, and flower coronals. There is sure to be a child, petted and worshipped to the point of folly. As likely as not, the toddler has been adopted from a reputable married woman, quite able to bring it up. But family life, based on marriage, is a Christian novelty, and the people have not abandoned the old pagan system. Long before her baby is born a woman will be pestered by friends to allow them to adopt it, and often she gives her infant away. It becomes the idol of the foster parents, who spoil it with kindness. Having regard to the natural strength of maternal feeling for the babe at the breast, this custom of adoption is one of the strangest in the world.

Deterioration Bred of Indolence

In the Middle Ages the natives were strong enough to populate New Zealand with a conquering stock that bore their native name of Mohari, and in a less relaxing clime grew fierce and hardy and inventive. But the Tahitians who did not join the great fleet had their strength of character sapped by their languorous ease of life.

Until Europeans appeared, they were saved from conscious degradation by the ignorance into which they had fallen. They had only oral traditions, and these changed with the change of manners. So they preserved and increased a peculiar refinement of taste, with remarkable courtesy and generosity. Their passion for the beauty of flowers is but a partial expression of their general love for all beautiful things. They have the feelings of painter and poet for the charm of a landscape.

As distinct from all half-breeds, very few of them remain. The miracle of their absolute physical loveliness is becoming only a legend. In laborious years of work, the French impressionist painter, Gauguin, who settled for life among them, with the aim of recording the last perfect types, is said never to have found what he longed to find in one young man or one girl. He had to compose his figures from living yet

SPLENDOUR IN SCARLET AND SILVER TAKES THE FLOOR

The tiara worn by this dancer is chiefly composed of hibiscus flowers, their scarlet petals affording a striking contrast to his rafia dress which gleams like silver. Since Tahiti became a French possession, July 14, France's national fête day, has been the occasion for the display of all the old festivities and festal costumes of the Tahitians

Photo, A. Aubertin

AMPHIBIAN PLACIDITY IN A PRECARIOUS POSITION

Tahitians are almost as much at home in and upon the water as they are on land. They learn to swim as soon as they can toddle, and when they grow up become most skilful and daring boatmen, driving their canoes through surf beating on coral reefs and through furious seas in which it would seem impossible such craft could live

Photo, Harrison W. Smith

IN A PACIFIC PARADISE WHERE EVERY PROSPECT PLEASES

A glamour of romance has rested over Tahiti, the principal island of the Society Archipelago in the South Pacific, since the days when Cook first gave voice to his laudatory descriptions of its scenery and inhabitants. Surrounded by coral reefs, intersected with lovely palm-tinged lagoons and bays, the island, with its exuberant mass of fruit, flower, and foliage, is indeed a veritable Garden of Eden

OLIVE-SKINNED EVE OF A TERRESTRIAL EDEN

Tahiti has long been known as a most enchanting spot, where dusky natives of comely form and gentle manners live happily and poetically in the midst of an indescribable wealth of natural beauties. An idyllic scene such as this is no uncommon sight, for the shores are dotted with these careless children of nature, lightly clad, but seldom without necklace and garland of flowers

"TAKE YOUR PLACES": TAHITIANS IN THE UPA-UPA DANCE

Spoiled by the enervating voluptuousness of the climate of their lovely island home, the Tahitians of pure blood are a degenerate people, steadily diminishing in numbers. In their decadence they preserve their native love of beauty, and a classic refinement stamps their manners and customs. Wonderful grace marks the movements of the flower-wreathed youths and maidens in their dances scattered traits. So must all questers. Yet even glimpses of the strange beauty of the race, here a face with a Monna Lisa smile, there another heavy with brooding passion, like Rossetti's Astarte, torsos that might have set Michelangelo rivalling Phidias, and bosoms like a Praxiteles bronze of Aphrodite—these can sometimes be found. Compared with the coarser but more abundant handsomeness of the Marquesans, they seem to indicate that, just as a mortal disease wrings immortal inspiration out of a Keats or a Chopin, so a fine, strong folk may put on a marvellous decadent beauty with subtle qualities of pure enchantment.

FRANCE : COLONIAL EMPIRE

But French Papeete is the vilest caricature of the old garden of love and beauty of Tahiti. The early half-breed stock, formed mainly out of American and British blood of rough whaler crews, bear a hopeless hatred towards the French. Knowing from the fate in 1897 of their kinsmen of the neighbouring Leeward Isles that rebellion is vain, they refuse to be converted to Catholicism, because that is the religion of the French, and hold with passionate pride to British Protestantism. It is also the mark of moral life and native patriotism to refuse to send children to a French school. Some permanent working French settlers strongly agree with the last of the natives. To them Papeete, with all it stands for, is an abomination. And there are Frenchmen in France of the same way of thinking.

But New Caledonia is perhaps the most striking example of the French way of doing the wrong thing in colony making. It is a great treasure island lying off Queensland, in a mild, warm, healthy climate, that would now be whirring with activity under white settlers if it had not been spoilt in the making. Except for occasional trouble with its mop-haired primitive black race of fairly industrious Melanesians, who number about 28,000 in a land about as large as Wales, there is no difficulty in colonisation. It is true that the Melanesian is inclined to cannibalism, but he only eats foes he has killed in the tribal wars, in order that their soul shall survive in him and redouble his spiritual powers, instead of surviving death and haunting him.

He has many strange ways and superstitions, and his ugliness and his blood-shot eyes make him look somewhat of an ogre. Yet he is a good

INDOLENCE ENDURES AN EASY YOKE

With his inborn indolence and dissolute ways, it is surprising that the Tahitian should still be blessed with a tall and robust frame. His greatest exertions are often confined to the making of wreaths or the carrying of fruits farmer of the New Stone Age, and knows how to make the best use of water by means of aqueducts and irrigation channels. His women, who wear their frizzy hair short and often limewashed, and clothe themselves in a waist-fringe of dyed coconut-fibre, in which a knife is stuck, are even less distinguished by their beauty than the men. They decorate themselves by pricking out patterns in their skin with sharp, dry plant-stems, which they set on fire, thus creating little goffered tumours, arranged in rows.

FRANCE: COLONIAL EMPIRE

But let it not be thought that modern civilization has not changed them. In the holes in their ears, in which they used to place large wooden ornaments, they now stick their pipes when they are not smoking. Those by the town of Noumea have taken to wearing a shapeless robe of coloured cotton, but full native dress consists, in addition to the fibre waist-fringe, of a necklace of pierced stones, bracelets of sea-shells, and a collar of the fur of a large fruit-eating bat, known as the flying fox. The men wear a waist-cloth, thigh bracelets of shells, armlets, bat fur collars, large ear-pendants of wood or bark, and head-dresses of feathers or verdure, often held by a turban knotted with the cord of their slings.

The country these savages scantily people is a majestic highland about 31 miles broad and 248 miles long, with peaks rising 5,400 feet above the tranquil tropic sea. All the turbulence of the ocean beats against an immense oval of coral that leaves a large, calm canal between reef and shore, along which coastwise commerce is conducted in a mountainous land with few roads. Large primeval forests clothe the mountain slopes, yet leave 1,600 square miles of pasture land, in addition to an equal extent of highly fertile tillable soil in the valleys.

SOCIETY BELLES OF A SOCIETY ISLAND

Tahitian girls are strikingly picturesque, but farcical European attire has deprived them of much of their charm; nevertheless, the seductive Tahitian smile and the pretty custom of wearing floral wreaths have not been utterly abolished

As the heights are largely of volcanic origin and weathered into grand and wild forms, sending cascades and streams down to water the lowlands, the scenery has a magnificent variety, with a luxuriance of foliage, verdure, and flowers that only a great landscape painter could depict. Even in the dry season the wooded mountains nightly collect the heavy oceanic dew, and so maintain perpetual springs. The heat of summer, that scorches inner Queensland, is admirably tempered on the great neighbouring island by moist south-east winds. The only natural forces to be feared are the great cyclones, occurring

FRANCE: COLONIAL EMPIRE

FLOWER OF THE FOREST

In beauty of colour and of form Tahiti's women are as enchanting as its vegetation. Witness this girl, like a fairy emerging from a flower bud in a transformation scene about once every four years, when roofs have to be chained down and every opening in houses firmly closed.

Photo, Paul Gooding

Having in very ancient times been a part of Australia, New Caledonia is poor in animal life. This is not altogether a disadvantage. Useful beasts are easily introduced, and there are no reptiles or beasts of prey to make life unpleasant, and among insects, only a little grey scorpion, centipede, and the spider are a nuisance. Moreover, there are no endemic diseases, and, as usually happens in the paradises of the South Seas, it is European disease that has carried off in less than seventy years two-thirds of the natives.

The room left for the white settlers is considerably greater than that indicated by the great extent of ground. New Caledonia, when completely developed, may need all her food supply to feed her artisans. Iron is found almost everywhere, and the known coalfields are 450 square miles in extent. Nature has also seen to it that only the finest qualities of steel will in the future be exported. For the island also contains immense mines of nickel, chrome, and cobalt, while copper, lead, silver, gold, zinc, and antimony are among the mineral riches awaiting exploitation. There is probably work for 4,000,000 people, with all the land of the Pacific as their market. Yet at present the free white population, including some 400 troops and many officials, is barely 10,000.

There are also some thousands of whites, of convict origin, together with many Asiatic labourers, who will not make desirable settlers on this white man's land. The lovely, wealthy colony was spoilt in 1864 by becoming the convict station of France. To it, after their period of penal labour, all convicts sentenced to eight years and more servitude were attached for the rest of their life. Although no convicts have been sent to the island since 1896, few French emigrants arrive, and French capital, required for the development of natural resources, is not forthcoming.

New Caledonia has a string of little interesting dependencies. These are the Loyalty Islands, rising out of the sea like three great coral mushrooms. On most of them flourishing Kanakas and a small invading stock of Polynesians grow oranges and coconuts, and escape water famine by drinking the milk of the coconuts and collecting rain-water. They do not gather all their nuts, for there is a Loyalty crab, with claws strong enough to break the coconut shell and a taste for the nut and its

FLUTE-PLAYING IN THE WILDS OF NEW CALEDONIA

The natives of New Caledonia were cannibals at the first appearance of the French on the island. There are several tribes, mainly of Papuan origin, each possessing its own chief and distinctive customs. Missionary influence has only partially tamed them, and among the gaunt and gloomy mountains naked warriors still roam, more skilled in the arts of warfare than in those of peace milk. Some of the islanders are Maoris migrant from the distant French possession of the Wallis Isles.

Photo, Field Museum of Chicago

Protestant and Catholic missionaries energetically contend to save the souls of Melanesian and Maori, and the majority of them are at present of the reformed creed. The little Belep Isles are two coconut plantations of Catholic converts. Beyond them are the uninhabited Huon Isles, which enterprising Australians stripped of much of their guano deposits, and off the Australian coast is another unpeopled group of isles, the Chesterfields, remarkable only for birds, turtles, and fish.

To British empire-building missionaries are mainly due the troubles of the French in the important archipelago of the New Hebrides, north of New Caledonia and the Loyalty Isles. The group is a large one, with a total land area about one-tenth that of England, volcanic soil of great fertility, and at least one active volcano.

A primitive Papuan-like race, similar to that of New Caledonia, and fifty thousand in number, is in process of conversion and education.

On Anatom Island reading and writing are common accomplishments. But there are still many tribes of merry, ferocious cannibals, whom slave-raiders, like Bully Hayes, used to "blackbird," or trap, for the sugar plantations. They do not like white men, for good reason, and require much winning over. They are ruled by witch-doctor kings, who owe their rank solely to the fact that they have inherited the cult of some potent spirit. These are a grief to missionaries,

NEW FASHIONS IN THE NEW HEBRIDES

Like all South Sea Islanders, the natives of the French New Hebrides wear a stick thrust through their nostrils. A gaudy loincloth is their only garment; bead necklets and armlets, and flowers and feathers in their hair, complete their toilet but a joy to anthropologists, as living, active evidence of the connexion between magic and monarchy, and of the practical origin of the divine rights of kings. As wildly picturesque as the royal sorcerers in full dress is the aristocracy of ghosts and spirits who keep the people in a proper state of fear. They are members of secret societies, dressed in fantastic masks and ornaments, hedged around with every circumstance of fear, and with whirring bull-roarers and other instruments of awesome sound. They haunt and punish all commoners who do not keep to ancient customs.

PRECAUTIONS AGAINST THE POWER OF EVIL SPIRITS

This old Melanesian native of the French New Hebrides regards his shrine as an inviolable sanctuary. None of the evil spirits has power to touch him when surrounded by such powerful guardians as the embalmed body of one of his ancestors keeping ceaseless vigil beside the wooden "ju-ju" in the background. Trophies of slain foemen he places in front of him for similar reasons

Photo, Martin Johnson

France

IV. The Story of French Expansion Overseas

By Edward Wright

Writer of "Annam: From Vassal Empire to French Colony"

FOR centuries France has been the most persistent of colonising powers, and, until recently, the most unfortunate. Her Normans conducted the grandest of her adventures oversea, and built up empires which they could not hold. In the eleventh century the Hautevilles won southern Italy and Sicily, and, largely by their example, inspired the Duke of Lower Lorraine to lead the attack on Syria and the Holy Land, which ended in the foundation of the kingdom of Jerusalem.

First Period of Empire-Building

When the last fragment of this kingdom fell, at the close of the thirteenth century, the Normans of Dieppe explored the western coast of Africa, and by 1365 they had strong trading stations in Senegal and Guinea. Then in a war of two years the Canary Islands were conquered by 1404 by a Norman lord, Jean de Bethencourt. Other Norman adventurers from Dieppe reached the Azores and Brazil, but kept their discoveries secret in order to exploit their tropical trade. The only permanent result of these Norman expeditions, which lacked royal and national support, was that a dozen shipowners of Dieppe became rich and powerful, and practically founded the modern mercantile marine of their country.

It was not until the reign of Henry of Navarre that conquest and colonisation were directed by the monarchy. Dieppe still led the main enterprises. Their governor organized the Canadian expedition under Champlain who, after Acadia, or Nova Scotia, was settled in 1604, founded Quebec town in 1608. Then in 1671 and 1681 the great Norman explorer, La Salle, extended the French-American Empire down to the mouth of Colbert river, better known as the Mississippi. By the middle of the eighteenth century the New France in America comprised nearly all Canada and about nine-tenths of the actual territory of the United States.

Richelieu continued the colonising effort of Henry of Navarre, with the open intention of outrivalling England. Guiana had been occupied in the reign of Henry as base for an Equatorial France. Richelieu maintained the French power there, and by buccaneers and more dignified adventurers, extended a strategic line across the seaway to Spanish Central America. His pirates settled in Haiti, and, between 1634 and 1655, Guadeloupe, Martinique, and other isles of the Lesser Antilles were taken.

In 1635 Saint Pierre and Miquelon were settled by Norman and Breton fishermen, with a view to commanding Newfoundland and its cod fishery and the waterway into Canada. Two years afterwards the Normans, still the leaders in colonial enterprise, recovered their old footing in Senegal. But Richelieu looked farther than Africa. He laid a new base of sea-power in the Indian Ocean, by the occupation of Réunion Island, and made a first attempt upon Madagascar, an island which forms the subject of a separate chapter. In 1642, five months before his death, he constituted the Company of the East Indies, that was to give France a great Oriental empire.

The French Company settled in Pondicherry in 1674, and, like the English and Dutch, acted as humble traders. But in the break-up of the Mogul power they were the first to assert the superiority of European arms and discipline, and under Dupleix in 1752, peninsular Hindustan was practically French. Eleven years afterwards, however, General Wolfe in America, and Clive in India, had destroyed French power in two continents, and the last large piece of colonial territory, Louisiana, was sold by Napoleon to the United States. At the fall of Napoleon the French possessed only Martinique, Guadeloupe, Saint Pierre, and Miquelon, part of Guiana and part of Senegal, the island of Réunion, and Pondicherry, and sixteen small towns in India with a territory of 196 square miles.

Second Period Opens with Algiers

In 1830 a new period of empire-building opened, without aim or plan. Two Algerian Jews claimed a considerable sum of money for corn supplied to Napoleon's army of Egypt, and the Dey of Algiers, taking up their case, insulted the French consul and interfered with the Marseillais coral factories on the coast that dated from the fourteenth century. In the hope of relieving domestic troubles by a bold foreign policy, King Charles X. despatched an expeditionary force of 37,000 men, who captured Algiers in July, 1830.

This did not prevent a revolution in France. The new king, Louis Philippe, thought of abandoning the campaign, but continued it for the same purpose of distracting the people. By 1834 the coast was occupied and the Atlas mountains reached. Then a Moslem prophet, Abdel-Kader, declared a holy war, and by ambushes and intrigues held the French at bay until 1847. When he was captured the Berbers continued the struggle, and Saharan tribesmen did much to bring disaster upon France by retaining one-fifth of the French army in Northern Africa during the war with Germany.

FRANCE: OVERSEAS EXPANSION

There was a serious native insurrection in 1871, suppressed after a campaign of five months of very heavy fighting. Other risings in 1879 and 1881, by the efforts they called forth, led the French officers far out into the sands of the Sahara.

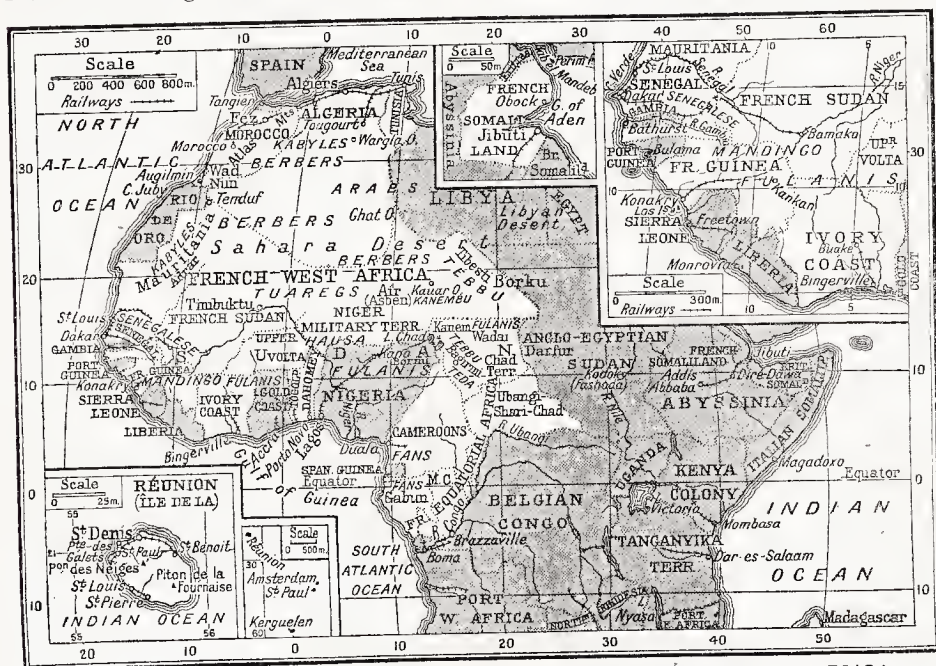

In return for having indirectly assisted in the defeat of France, the African races were to provide in the next struggle the famous "Black Force" that might turn the balance of power in continental Europe. It was with this definite aim, held at first in secret, but published at last by General Mangin, that some of the finest spirits in the French army, such as Gallieni and Joffre, Gonraud and Humbert, stretched the power of their country down to the Niger, thence to Lake Chad, and down to the Congo.

Algeria is probably the most dearly-bought colony of any modern European Power. Yet, as in the age of the expansion of Rome, which was less successful than France in taming the Berber, it became a source of strength to its conquerors by reason both of its fertile valleys and of the fighting quality of its original stock of hardy mountaineers. French settlement was at first slow. There were scarcely more than 120,000 French men, women, and children definitely colonising the country in 1871, but more land for farming was won by confiscating the territory of native rebels, in addition to the purchase of large plantations of promise.

By the expansion of the vineyards, market gardens, and general farms, more French families were attracted. At the outbreak of the Great War, Algeria held some 560,000 French people, and perhaps 4,000,000 Berbers, and about 1,000,000 people of Moslem, Jewish, and Christian stocks. After many experiments in the system of government, including a preliminary essay in civil administration in 1848, and a military regime that lasted until 1858, a so-called Arab kingdom was worked very badly until, in 1870, the country was placed under the control of the Minister of the Interior, and made a kind of oversea part of France. In 1900 the French Algerians were granted separate financial autonomy, yet freed from military, naval, and railway expenses.

For many years the enterprising military adventurers of France, vehemently bent upon empire-building against the judgement of a strong body of enlightened French politicians, looked with avid eyes upon Tunis and Morocco. Their chief idea was to lighten their task in Algeria by getting more elbow room on either side of their theatre of warfare.' Sober French statesmen, like M. Clemenceau, thought always of the next European war, knowing that Bismarck plotted to ensure the neutrality of Great Britain by allowing France, if not instigating her, to conquer as much of Africa as she pleased, so as to bring her into serious conflict with British interests.

FRENCH EXPANSION OVERSEAS: LANDS AND PEOPLES IN AFRICA

FRANCE: OVERSEAS EXPANSION

International Friction over Tunis

On the ground that the Bey of Tunis was supporting unruly tribes along his frontier, and deliberately ruining every French enterprise in his dominion, the French in 1881 attacked the Tunis border tribes, and also landed an expeditionary force at Bizerta. The Turks despatched an intercepting squadron, and prepared to land an army to aid the Tunisians. The Third French Republic, engaged in its first war since the Franco-Prussian conflict, practically offered battle against the Ottoman Empire. The Sultan then avoided open rupture by embarking his troops in Tripoli, and the helpless Bey, with his country in a state of bankruptcy, signed a treaty accepting the French protectorate. A Tunisian chief, Ali-ben-Khalifa, started a border campaign along the Tripoli frontier, but his men gradually abandoned him. When he died under his tent, in 1884, he was almost powerless, and the country generally was subdued.

The Italians, as Bismarck foresaw, were much perturbed by the extension of French Africa over territory they had intended to take, in order to counter-balance French power in Algeria. They threatened to raise the affair into a serious European matter when the Italian schools in Tunis were interfered with, but the Germans, instead of offering support in the intended war, drew them into the Triple Alliance. But for skilful British diplomacy in the years before the outbreak of the great struggle, Tunis might have been, in 1914, a more costly acquisition for France than had been Algeria in 1870.

From Senegal to the Upper Niger

Jules Ferry, who had launched France on this new career of empire-building, with the sardonic approval of Bismarck, took the favourable verdict of a general election as covering all possible efforts at foreign conquests, from Cochin-China and Madagascar to the Sudan and other tropical regions. With the enthusiastic support of practically all the army officers of the new generation, he resumed the questing adventuresomeness of the last Napoleon, and at times warred for regions of deadly tropic diseases that were not worth the cost of the continuous loss of life in holding them.

Perhaps the most important of the new work of colony-making was that which opened from the most ancient of French African settlements, Senegal. Napoleon III. had sent a strong fighting force there in 1854, under General Faidherbe, who, by continuous warfare for three years and a half, broke the southern Moorish tribes around St. Louis, and annexed several small native kingdoms. Then in 1880 General Galliéni, as captain of marines, started with a column to penetrate the Upper Niger, and was captured after a severe action by a sultan of territory above Timbuktu. While he was held prisoner another officer of marines, with a stronger expeditionary force, fought his way into the hinterland of the British colony of Sierra Leone, and imposed peace upon the obstinate sultan of the Upper Niger, as well as establishing a very shadowy protectorate over the country.

Prolonged Fight for the Western Sudan

A railway was planned to connect Senegal and the Niger, but when the first section was built in 1883 the Chamber of Deputies refused further funds, and barely sixty miles of line was constructed. The natives of Timbuktu, who were oppressed by their lords of the wild Berber class known as Tuaregs, sent a delegation to Paris begging the French President to open the way to their city. There were many small fighting nations to conquer before this could be done—nations of mongrel negro, Arab, and Berber strains, most of whom were fiercely barbaric, and trained by constant fighting among themselves to a remarkable degree of bravery and strength of character.

In two campaigns, from 1886 to 1888, General Galliéni broke into the Western Sudan, defeating the famous native Sultan Samory, and sending a gunboat down the Niger, under Commandant Caron, who reached Timbuktu in 1887, and found the city wrecked and ruled by hostile Berbers of the Sahara. This voyage and others that followed were but reconnaissances, for which the Niger kings retaliated by raids down the Senegal river to French headquarters.

Year after year continued the battle of the Western Sudan, during which the great slave-raiding sultan, Samory, formed a large brigand empire round the Upper Niger, selling about a million and a half captives to the Tuaregs and other slave dealers, in return for gold, ivory, and cattle, with which he bought munitions from traders on the Guinea coast. During this long war, in which another famous French leader, General Humbert, won a series of remarkable victories, the British Royal Niger Company contended with the French Equatorial Company in opening the land to trade. The Governments on both sides intervened in the summer of 1890, and the disputed territories were divided between the powers. Marshal Joffre settled affairs in Timbuktu, General Gouraud captured Samory in 1898, while General Marchand, by trying to stretch the power of France to the Nile at Fashoda, near the Abyssinian border, brought about another arrangement of territories between the British and French Governments.

FRANCE: OVERSEAS EXPANSION

General Marchand's adventure was connected with another centre of French expansion in Africa. French merchants had settled in 1839 by the Gabun river, above the Congo, in naval operations against slave traders. The son of one of the settlers, Du Chaillu, made the region famous by his discovery of the gorilla, but the colony was completely neglected until Sir Henry Stanley and the King of the Belgians prepared to found the Congo State.

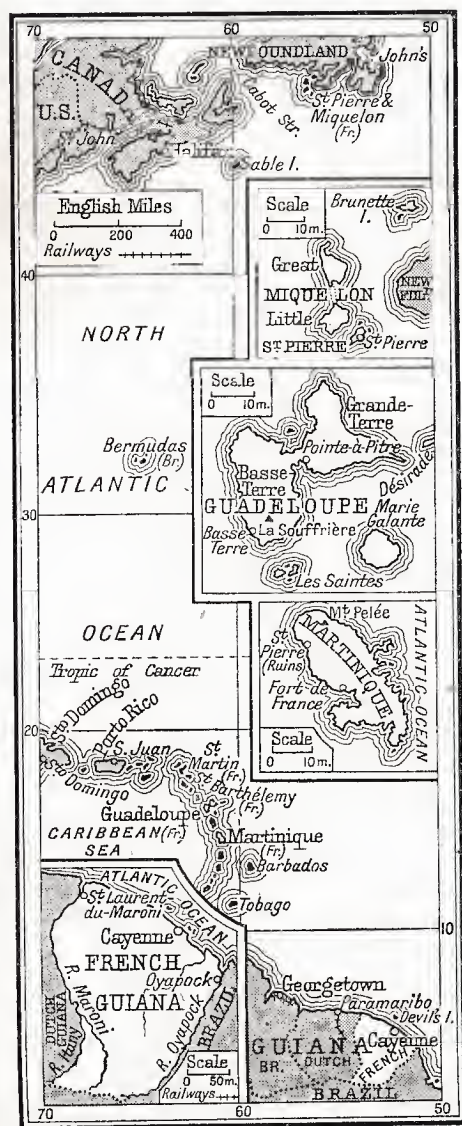

Then an enterprising French governor, M. Brazza, was empowered to open up the country. In 1882 part of the Congo territory was taken, leading to a dispute with the International Association of the Congo. At the Berlin Conference of 1885 France did not succeed in maintaining her claim to the Congo basin, at which Jules Ferry had aimed. French explorers, however, steadily worked between the German region of Cameroon and the Belgian Congo, towards and from the Sahara. At Lake Chad the Mahdi of the Senussi confraternity was overthrown and killed in 1902, two years after the slave-raiding sultan of Bornu was defeated and slain.

French forces from Algeria and from the Congo united, and the way was clear in 1903 for a caravan trade from the oases below the Atlas range to the network of waterways above the Congo. Owing to the German attempt to intervene at Agadir in Moroccan affairs, part of the new territory of France, between the Congo and Lake Chad, had, in 1911, to be surrendered to Germany and attached to Cameroon, but by the Peace of Versailles and arrangements between the Allies not only was this lost land returned to France, but she took as well the larger part of the Cameroon, leaving only a smallish portion to be merged into British Nigeria.

Other French possessions in Western Africa likewise began to expand about 1883, under the ministry of Jules Ferry, according to the plan for the making of the present vast African Empire. The Ivory Coast had been partly won by purchase in 1842, but the permanent settlement only began in 1883. Then, during the struggle with Samory, exploring French forces arranged protectorates with chiefs whose peoples were menaced by the terrible slave-raider, and French victories rapidly connected the Ivory Coast with the new Niger territories. In much the same way French Guinea, transiently settled in 1843, was expanded in the Niger campaigns, and connected with French West Africa by occupation of the hinterlands of Sierra Leone and Liberia.

Alongside Nigeria and Togoland was Dahomey, and here the French also thrust inland, after centuries of inactivity. In the seventeenth century they held a fort at the town of Whydah on the coast, alongside forts built by the British and the Portuguese. The British fort was sold to a German firm; the Portuguese fort was neglected; but the French fort was maintained, and its territory reassured by a treaty in 1851.

FRENCH TERRITORY IN AMERICA

FRANCE. OVERSEAS EXPANSION

In 1863 Napoleon III. obtained a protectorate over the kingdom of Porto Novo, and the king of Dahomey, fearful of British power, gave further advantages to the French who, however, abandoned their protectorate. Jules Ferry seized it again in 1883, according to his general policy, but the king of Dahomey wanted his land of 1895, and bombarded it into surrender. A long guerrilla war followed, and for some ten years General Galliéni, called from French Sudan for the difficult work, conducted a campaign of repression and pacification. Queen Ranavalona was deposed in 1897, and died in exile in Algeria in 1917.

Likewise, in 1883, a settlement was made on the Somali coast opposite Perim, but an attempt to annex neighbouring territory belonging to Egypt was resisted in 1887 by Lord Salisbury. French Somaliland thereupon lost its importance as a centre of expansion and naval base. The capital was moved from Obok to Jibuti in 1896, and trade opened with Abyssinia.

On the other side of Africa, Morocco, from the foundation of the Algerian colony, had been coveted by France. Spain asserted ancient rights, and arrangements were made by the French to observe them. Great Britain however, held, from the days of Nelson, that the independence of the Sultanate was vital to her position as a Mediterranean sea-power. Profound, therefore, was the disillusion of Germany when, in 1904, the British Government agreed to the French pretensions over the Sultanate of the West. Germany threatened war; the British Liberal Cabinet vigorously met the threat.

Again in 1911 the Germans menaced the French, and once more the British intervened, but, largely through their anger over the friendly solution of the Franco-British problem of Morocco, the Germans opened the struggle for the mastership of Europe in 1914. All that Bismarck had seemed to achieve, when he induced Jules Ferry to go empire-building directly against Italian and British interests, had been undone by the generosity of King Edward VII. and his Conservative and Liberal ministers. General Lyautey skilfully held French Morocco during the Great War, and the victorious Republic emerged from the struggle with a vast African empire of tested stability and loyal fighting strength, to which was added, in 1920, 20,072 square miles of Togoland and a total of 273,759 square miles of Cameroon.

In the Orient the French acquired a footing in Annam in 1787, lost it soon afterwards, regained and enlarged it by a severe action in 1861; and Cambodia was annexed in 1863, in the form of a protectorate. Meanwhile, France won another million back, and, after some years of hesitation, raided the French factories and scattered the people into British territory. The French opened war in 1889, but the result was indecisive, and in 1892 the Dahomey king swept in force down to the coast again, to recover the customs revenue he had surrendered for one-fourth of their value. Within three months a small French force captured his capital city, and a few weeks afterwards Dahomey was a French colony, opening out into French West Africa.

FRANCE: COLONIES IN INDIA AND INDO-CHINA

In pursuance of the Ferry policy of expansion, the great island of Madagascar was invaded on slight pretext in 1883. It was a dangerous game at the time, for considerable British interests, naval as well as commercial, were concerned in the maintenance of the independence of the Madagascan people. Nevertheless, with the ironic approval of Bismarck, and against the fierce but vain opposition of Clemenceau, the attack was developed, and the Malagasy Queen Ranavalona was forced to accept, in spite of some successes in the field, a vague protectorate. When, however, the conquerors tried to exercise a real control over the islands, the Malagasy premier engaged British officers to train the native soldiery. France declared war in 1894, before the island army could be drilled in modern ways of fighting. After losing many men from fever, the French General Duchesne reached the hostile capital in the autumn and a half Oriental subjects, with the Laos territory acquired in 1893, Kwangchow Wan leased for 99 years by China in 1898, and three ancient Cambodian provinces ceded by Siam in 1907, the last being, however, among the deadliest regions on earth.

FRANCE: OVERSEAS EXPANSION

In the South Seas the lovely island of Tahiti, with its surrounding isles, is a gem of France's colonial empire. Until 1842 its beautiful people were practically ruled by missionaries from London, but the arrival of two French Catholic priests was opposed, and this formed the ground for the intervention of a French warship, that abruptly compelled the island queen to accept a Gallic protectorate. So soon as the warship sailed away the natives refused to recognize the French dominion, and after a long struggle a French force conquered the island in 1846.

Then in 1880, in consequence of the heir to the throne having married the daughter of an Englishman, Tahiti was definitely annexed. Various dependent archipelagos, such as the Tuamotu group, the Gambier isles, the Marquesas isles, the Leeward, Tubuai, and Rapa isles, were gradually occupied between 1842 and 1901. Awakening interest in the value of the coconut, in the sun-dried form of copra, led to the last annexations. Historically, New Caledonia and its dependencies are connected with Tahiti, though rising on the other side of the South Seas, off Australia. Some French missionaries, coming from Tahiti, were eaten by the cannibal natives. To avenge them Napoleon III. seized the island in 1853, and embarrassed by the cannibals, turned them to account as terrors to wrongdoers, by making the large new territory a penal colony, the first convicts arriving in 1854.

The New Hebrides were occupied at the same time as New Caledonia, but the British missionaries working among the wild natives were more fortunate than those in Tahiti. They protested so strongly that the French garrison was withdrawn, and by a series of agreements an Anglo-French protectorate was established in 1907.

The last important addition to the Gallic oversea possessions is Syria, obtained by the Sykes-Picot Treaty during the Great War, and, after British conquest of the country, placed under the mandatory power of France. The far-stretched colonial domain of the Third Republic of France is practically the work of a single generation.

FRENCH EXPANSION OVERSEAS: FACTS AND FIGURES

The Countries

In Africa: Algeria, Tunis, Equatorial Africa or French Congo (Gabun, Middle Congo, Ubangi-Shari-Chad, Chad Territory, and Cameroons), West Africa (Senegal, Guinea, Ivory Coast, Dahomey, Upper Senegal, Niger or French Sudan, Upper Volta, Mauritania, Niger Territory, and Togoland), Madagascar, Mayotte, Réunion, and Somali Coast. America: Guadeloupe and dependent islands, Guiana, Martinique, Saint Pierre and Miquelon. Asia: India (Pondicherry, Karikal, Chandanagore, Mahé, Yanam), Indo-China (Annam, Cambodia, Cochinchina, Tongking, and Kwangchow Wan). Australasia and Oceania: New Caledonia and dependencies, Society, Marquesas, Tuamotu, Leeward, Gambier, Tubuai, and Rapa Islands.

Algeria, Annam, Cambodia, Madagascar, Tunis, and Morocco are dealt with separately.

Africa

FRENCH EQUATORIAL AFRICA OR FRENCH CONGO.—On Atlantic coast, between Cameroons in the west, and Belgian Congo on the south and south-east, and Anglo-Egyptian Sudan on the east, excepting Spanish Guinea and the Portuguese enclave of Cabinda.

Total area (exclusive of Cameroons, 166,489 square miles, and 107,270 square miles ceded to Germany in 1911 and since returned by Treaty of Versailles) about 982,049 square miles (Gabun 121,862, Middle Congo 150,292, Ubangi-Shari-Chad 208,219, and Chad Territory 501,676).

Under a governor-general at Brazzaville, in Middle Congo. Chief products: Wild caoutchouc, palm oil, coffee, tobacco, and ivory.

WEST AFRICA.—Territory bounded by Morocco, Algeria, Tunisia, and Libya (Tripoli) on the north;

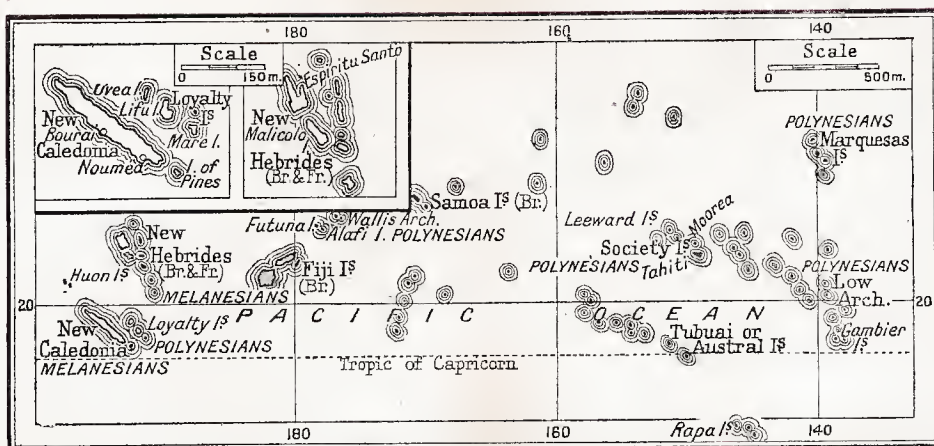

the Atlantic, Gambia, Portuguese Guinea, Sierra Leone, and Liberia on the west; the Gulf of Guinea, Gold Coast, and Nigeria on the south; and French Equatorial Africa and Anglo-Egyptian Sudan on the east. Includes Western Sudan and great part of Sahara.

Total area, exclusive of Togoland, about 1,800,566 square miles (Senegal 74,112 square miles, Guinea, with Los Islands, 95,218, Ivory Coast 121,976, Dahomey 42,460, Sudan, 617,600, Upper Volta 154,400, Mauritania 347,400, Niger Military Territory 347,400). Population 12,283,962, including 6,829 French and 1,826 foreign non-Africans. French Togoland covers about 21,200 square miles, with a native population of 1,000,000. Whole territory under governor-general at Dakar, Senegal. Products include fruits, oils, oil seeds, rubber, cotton, cacao, coffee, timber, ground nuts, palm-kernels, hides, wool.

MADAGASCAR.—Island in Indian Ocean off south-east coast of Africa, about 250 miles from mainland. Under governor-general. Area about 228,000 square miles, population 3,545,370. Malagasy tribes numerous. Capital, Antananarivo (population 63,110); chief port, Tamatave (15,000).

RÉUNION, OR BOURBON.—Island in Indian Ocean about 400 miles east of Madagascar. Under governor. Area 970 square miles. Population 173,190, including 167,947 Europeans. Products include sugar, rum, coffee, manioc, tapioca, vanilla, spices.

SOMALILAND.—Colony in north-east Africa, adjoining Eritrea near Strait of Bab-el-Mandeb, has inland frontier with Abyssinia, coastline in Gulf of Aden, and adjoins British Somaliland on the south-east. Administered by governor. Area about 5,790 square miles. Population about 65,000. Products include coffee, ivory, hides, skins, and salt. There are coast fisheries.

FRANCE: ISLAND TERRITORIES AND PEOPLES IN AUSTRALASIA AND OCEANIA

America

GUADELOUPE.—Two islands, Basse-Terre and Grande-Terre, in West Atlantic, with five smaller island dependencies, Marie Galante, Les Saintes, Désirade, St. Barthélemy, and St. Martin. Total area about 532 square miles. Population 229,822. Under governor. Products: Sugar, coffee, cacao, rum, bananas, sweet potatoes, manioc, tobacco.

GUIANA.—Colony on north-east coast of South America. Area about 32,000 square miles. Population 49,000, exclusive of penal settlement of Maroni. Under governor. Has rich timber forests. Chief industry, placer gold-mining. Silver, iron, and phosphates also worked, and rice, maize, manioc, cacao, coffee, sugar-cane, indigo, gutta-percha, and tobacco grown.

MARTINIQUE.—One of the Windward Islands, between Dominica and Santa Lucia. Under governor. Area 385 square miles. Population 244,439. Produces sugar, rum, cacao, coffee, tobacco, cotton.

SAINT PIERRE AND MIQUELON.—Islands of two groups near south coast of Newfoundland. Under administrator. Area of Saint Pierre group 10 square miles; population 3,420; area of Miquelon group, 83 square miles; population 499. Chief industry: Cod fishing.

Asia

FRENCH INDIA.—Five colonies: Pondicherry, Karikal, Chandernagore, Mahé, Yanam. Total area about 196 square miles. Population about 268,000. Under governor. Possess cotton and jute mills, oil presses, and iron foundry. Crops: Ground nuts, paddy, rice, sugar, cotton, coffee.

FRENCH INDO-CHINA.—Includes five states: colony of Cochin-China, protectorates of Annam, Cambodia, Tong-king, Laos, territory around Battambang and Kwangchow Wan leased from China. Total area about 310,344 square miles. Population about 16,990,229, including, exclusive of military forces, about 23,700 Europeans. Under governor-general, with resident-superior for each state, excepting Cochin-China, under governor.

Area of Cambodia (see separate article), 57,900 square miles. Population about 2,000,000, including 1,100 Europeans, 108,500 Annamites, and 140,000 Chinese. Produces, rice, kapok, cotton, pepper, salt fish, hides, sugar, tobacco.

Cochin-China covers about 22,000 square miles, and has a population of 3,452,250, including 6,300 Europeans, the rest Annamites, Cambodians, Mois, Chams, Chinese, Indians, Malays, and Tagals. Produces rice, rubber, maize, beans, sweet potatoes, earth nuts, cotton, sugar-cane, tobacco, coconuts, betel nuts, pepper, oranges, and bananas. River and coast fishing extensive.

Tong-king has an area of 40,530 square miles. Population 6,470,250, including about 6,880 Europeans. Produces rice, maize, arrowroot, sugar-cane, coffee, tea, raw silk, tobacco, fruit.

Laos has an area of about 96,500 square miles. Population 800,000. Products include rice, cotton, indigo, tobacco, and fruits. Large teak forests. Gold, tin, and lead are worked.

Kwangchow Wan territory area is about 190 square miles. Population 168,000.

Australasia and Oceania

NEW CALEDONIA.—Island in South Seas, 1,077 miles from Sydney. Area 7,650 square miles. Population between 50,000 and 60,000, includes Melanesians, Polynesians, Javanese, and Tong-kingese. Under governor. Penal settlement at Noel Island. Only half of area cultivable. Minerals include nickel and chrome ore and manganese. Coffee, copra, cotton, manioc, maize, tobacco, bananas, pineapples chief products. Dependencies: Isle of Pines, Wallis Archipelago, Loyalty, Huon, Futuna, and Alofi Islands.

NEW HEBRIDES.—Pacific group under Anglo-French officials. Area about 5,000 square miles. Population, chiefly Melanesian, about 70,000. Produce copra, bananas, sago, rubber, tortoiseshell, sandalwood, and coffee.

Other establishments in Oceania forming a collective colony have an estimated area of about 1,520 square miles, and population of 31,480. Under governor and council. They include the Society Islands of which Tahiti has an area of about 600 square miles and a population of 11,700; Moorea, an area of 50 square miles, and a population of about 1,570. Marquesas Islands have a total area of 480 square miles, and a population of about 3,430. In addition are the Low Archipelago, or Tuamotu, Leeward, Gambier, Tubuai, and Rapa groups. Tahiti produces sugar-cane, vanilla, rum, and tropical fruits, and with Moorea is rich in phosphate.